

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

(Elliott and Coffey, JJ., dissent.)

1. One who is intoxicated to the extent of being deprived of the mental capacity to deliberate or premeditate cannot commit a crime of which the statute makes premeditation an essential element, if he had formed no purpose to commit the crime prior to the time he became so intoxicated; hence upon the trial of a person charged with having committed murder in the first degree, of which premeditation is an essential element, the fact that the accused was drunk at the time he committed the crime may be considered for the purpose of determining whether or not there was premeditation.

2. Instructions by the trial court which

3. An instruction as to the individual responsibility of the jurors to be fully satisfied of the guilt of a person accused of crime before concurring in a verdict of guilty should be given if seasonably requested.

4. An accused person is not entitled to a special instruction to the effect that the mere finding of an indictment against him does not raise any presumption of guilt, where that idea is conveyed by the general charge of the court.

Evidence of drunkenness; when admissible.

Intoxication at the time of the act committed by the accused is a fact which may affect both physical ability and mental condition. Ferrell v. State, 43 Tex. 508.

It is admissible to prove the mental status of the accused to determine the degree of the offense, where the offense is divisible into degrees. People v. Odell, 1 Dak. 197; *Colbath v. APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Criminal Circuit Court for Marion County entered upon a verdict convicting him of the crime of murder in the first degree. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mrs. Duncan & Smith, for appellants:

The accused was entitled to an instruction that each juror must be satisfied of his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt before there could be a conviction.

Castle v. State, 75 Ind. 146.

The accused was entitled to the instruction that the mere return of the indictment by the grand jury did not raise any presumption of guilt.

Ibid.

The court erred in instructing that the defense of insanity should be very carefully scrutinized by the jury.

Garra v. State, 2 West. Rep. 639, 105 Ind. 117.

The defendant could not be rightfully convicted of murder in the first degree if at the time of the commission of the alleged offense his mental condition was such that he was not capable of deliberate thought and rational determination though his mental state was the result of mere intoxication.

Intoxication in the commission of the act charged. State v. Johnson, 40 Conn. 136; Swan v. State, 4 Humph. 136; Pirtle v. State, 8 Humph. 606; Halle v. State, 11 Humph. 134; Boswell v. Conn. 20 Gratt. 880. Compare, however, State v. Sneed, 3 West. Rep. 707, 80 Mo. 123.

It may be admitted to show that the accused was in hot blood at the time; but if the design to kill had been already formed, that he was in hot blood is immaterial as to the degree of the offense. State v. Garrard, 5 Or. 316.

In such case his intoxication furnishes no extenuation. See cases cited in first paragraph of note; State v. Johnson, 41 Conn. 224; Malone v. State, 49 Ga. 210; *Cluck v. It is admissible to prove that the accused was incapable of forming a premeditated design (Cartwright v. State, 6 Lea, 375); and is always admissible to disprove the specific intent which is necessary to constitute the crime. Roberts v. People, 19 Mich. 401; People v. Walker, 39 Mich. 150.

It is admissible to prove that his condition was such that he could not form any intent. People v. Harris, 20 Cal. 373; People v. Eastwood, 14 N. Y. 308; Barber v. State, 30 Ohio St. 320; Cline v. State, 1 West. Rep. 31, 43 Ohio St. 322.

The fact of excessive drunkenness is admissible to reduce the grade of the crime only where the question of intent, malice or premeditation is involved. Engelhardt v. State, 36 Ala. 100.

It is admissible to prove that defendant was so intoxicated that he could not have or form the intent which is a necessary ingredient of the crime charged against him. Cline v. State, 1 West. Rep. 31, 43 Ohio St. 322.

In cases which involve intention as well as act, it may be proper to hear proof of the condition of the accused, at the time of the offense, to test his capacity to decide between right and wrong. Wenz v. State, 1 Tex. App. 33.

Mrs. Louis T. Michener, Atty-Gen., and John H. Gillett, Asst. Atty-Gen., for the State:

If the appellant before the killing was capable of entertaining a purpose to kill, and of deliberating upon it, if only for a moment, his act, if preceded by such purpose and deliberation, was murder in the first degree; the mere fact that by intoxication appellant had deprived his reason of the power to dominate over his will does not excuse.

Roberts v. People, 19 Mich. 401.

To constitute premeditation there need be no appreciable space of time between the formation of the intention to kill and the killing; they may be as instantaneous as successive thoughts.

character of the act as well as his purpose and intent. Ferrell v. State, 43 Tex. 502.

For what purposes may be considered by the jury.

Where the very essence of the crime charged is the intention with which the act is done, it may be left to the jury to determine whether defendant was so drunk as to be incapable of forming any intention whatever. Reg. v. Cross, 3 Car. & P. 541; Reg. v. Monkhouse, 4 Cox, Cr. Cas. 55; Com. v. Hogenlock, 1 New Eng. Rep. 305, 140 Mass. 123.

It can only be considered in cases involving the condition of the defendant's mind when the act was done. State v. Mowry, 37 Kan. 322; State v. Lowe, 11 West. Rep. 910, 38 Mo. 547.

Although the voluntary state of drunkenness cannot excuse the commission of crime, yet where, as upon a charge of murder, the question is whether an act is premeditated or not, or whether done only from sudden heat or impulse, the fact of intoxication is a circumstance proper to be taken into consideration. Reg. v. Grindley, cited in 1 Russ. Cr. 29 Am. ed. 2; Reg. v. Carroll, 7 Car. & P. 145.

In cases which involve intention as well as act, proof of the condition of the accused as to sobriety at the time of his offense may be considered, to test his capacity to decide between right and wrong. Wenz v. State, 1 Tex. App. 33.

Drunkenness may be considered on the question of malice, and whether his expressions manifested a deliberate purpose or were merely the idle utterances of a drunken man. Reg. v. Thomas, 7 Car. & P. 517; Wilkinson v. Com. (Ky.) Sept. 13, 1880; Malone v. State, 49 Ga. 210; cases cited in first paragraph of note.

On the charge of murder it may be considered in determining whether there was that deliberation, premeditation and intent to kill necessary to constitute the offense. State v. Mowry, supra.

If accused was so drunk as to have been incapable to form a design to kill, it cannot be murder in the first degree. Cartwright v. State, 6 Lea, 375.

If the design to kill had been already formed with deliberation and premeditation, it is not material that the accused was in a passion, at the time of killing, caused by his voluntary intoxication. State v. Garrard, 5 Or. 316.

Binn v. State, 66 Ind. 436; McDermott v. State, 69 Ind. 187; Koerner v. State, 98 Ind. 7.

Mitchell, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Grand Jury of Marion County presented, in an indictment duly returned into the criminal court, that Edward Arman, on a day named, did feloniously, purposely and with premeditated malice, kill and murder Bertha Elff, a human being. The defendant pleaded generally "not guilty," and specially, in writing, that he was of unsound mind when the offense was committed. He was convicted of murder in the first degree and sentenced to suffer death.

The homicide occurred on the evening of August 24, 1889. There was evidence tending to show that the accused came from Chicago, where he had been at work for some weeks, to Indianapolis, about twelve days before the homicide. There was also evidence tending to show that while at Chicago the accused exhibited some peculiarities of conduct, which indicated that he was laboring under some mental delusion or hallucination, as, for example, that he indulged the unfounded belief that he was being pursued by persons armed with long knives. It also appeared that he was addicted to the use of intoxicating drink.

The State attributed all his peculiar conduct to a condition brought on by excessive indulgence in intoxicating drink, while on his behalf it was claimed that his conduct, coupled with the circumstances under which the homicide was committed, and the attempt by the accused to commit suicide, all indicated such a state of mental disorder as rendered him irresponsible, or at least incapable of deliberate thought or rational determination.

The accused seems to have maintained relations of intimacy with Bertha Elff, the victim of the homicide, to whose society he in some way laid claim, to the exclusion of other men. The evidence tends to show that he had been drinking to excess during the day, and that while walking with the deceased during the evening, the subject of her receiving attentions from another man was under discussion. She denied the right of the accused to question her conduct in the respects mentioned, whereupon he inflicted a mortal wound upon her by cutting her across the throat with his knife, and then attempted to take his own life by inflicting a long deep wound across his own throat with the knife. She was found dead from the wound inflicted, as stated above, in a few moments afterwards, and he was found within fifty feet of her body in an unconscious condition, with a self-inflicted wound, from which the evidence tends to show death would have ensued but for timely surgical aid. It is not claimed that there was any evidence tending to show that the accused had formed the design to take the life of the deceased prior to the evening on which the homicide occurred, and that he voluntarily became intoxicated in order to prepare himself for the execution of his premeditated and previously formed purpose.

There was evidence to which an instruction relating to the mental condition of the accused, as affected by the voluntary intoxication, at the time the homicidal act was committed, was applicable. The only instruction given by the court relating to that feature of the case was the following:

"Frenzy, arising solely from the passions of anger and jealousy, no matter how furious, is not insanity. A man with ordinary will power, which is unimpaired by disease, is required by law to govern and control his passions. If he yields to wicked passions and purposely and maliciously slays another, he cannot escape the penalty prescribed by law on the ground of mental incapacity. That state of mind, caused by wicked and ungovernable passions, resulting, not from mental lesion, but solely from evil passions, constitutes that mental condition which the law abhors, and to which the term 'malice' is applied. The condition of mind which usually and immediately follows the excessive use of alcoholic liquors is not the unsoundness of mind meant by our law. Voluntary drunkenness does not even palliate or excuse."

The 13th and 14th instructions asked by the accused are in legal effect the same. The 14th is as follows:

"While voluntary intoxication is no excuse or palliation for any crime actually committed, yet if upon the whole evidence in this cause you shall have such reasonable doubt whether, at the time of the killing,—if you shall find from the evidence accused did kill Bertha Elff,—he had sufficient mental capacity to deliberately think upon and rationally to determine as to kill deceased, then you cannot find him guilty of murder in the first degree, although such inability was the result of intoxication."

The propriety of the ruling of the court in refusing to give the 13th and 14th instructions, or either of them, is now before us for consideration. Section 1904, Rev. Stat. 1881, reads as follows: "Whoever purposely and with premeditated malice, or in the perpetration of, or attempt to perpetrate, any rape, arson, robbery or burglary, or by administering poison, or causing the same to be done, kills any human being, is guilty of murder in the first degree, and upon conviction thereof," etc.

Other sections define murder in the second degree, and declare what shall constitute voluntary and involuntary manslaughter. The distinction between murder in the first degree and murder in the second degree has been so often stated, and is so well understood, that it would be useless repetition to reiterate it here. Pahantook v. State, 23 Ind. 231; Binn v. State, 66 Ind. 436; McDermott v. State, 69 Ind. 187; Koerner v. State, 98 Ind. 7.

It is sufficient to say that, in order that there may be such premeditated malice as will make a homicide murder in the first degree, the thought of taking life must have been consciously conceived in the mind, the conception must have been meditated upon and a deliberate determination formed to do the act. Where a homicide has been preceded by a concurrence of will, with an intention to kill, and these are followed by a deliberate thought or premeditation, although they follow as instantaneously as successive thoughts can follow each other, the premeditator may be guilty of murder in the first degree. But as it is of the very essence of the crime that there should have been time and opportunity for deliberation or premeditation, after the mind has consciously formed the design to take life, it follows, as a necessary corollary, that there must have been the mental capacity to think deliberately upon and determine rationally in respect to the nature and consequences of the act which follows. It would be as logical as well as a logical incongruity to hold that the crime of murder in the first degree could only be committed after deliberate thought or premeditated malice, and yet that it might be committed by one who was without mental capacity to think deliberately or determine rationally. As a matter of course, the rule is universal that voluntary intoxication is no excuse for crime, nor does it in any degree mitigate or palliate an offense actually committed. To hold otherwise would unbridle crime and subvert public order. On the contrary, where there is reason to believe that one has conceived the design to commit a crime, and, while harboring the unlawful purpose, voluntarily becomes intoxicated in order to blunt his moral sensibilities and nerve himself up to the execution of his preconceived design, the offense is thereby greatly aggravated. State v. Robinson, 20 W. Va. 710, 48 Am. Rep. 700.

Where, however, the essence of a crime depends upon the intent with which an act was done, or where an essential ingredient of the crime consists in the doing of an unlawful act with a deliberate and premeditated purpose, the mental condition of the accused, whether that condition is occasioned by voluntary intoxication or otherwise, is an important factor to be considered. Smith v. Com. 1 Duvall, 227; State v. Garvey, 11 Minn. 168.

Thus in Chase v. State, 48 Ohio St. 332, 1 West. Rep. 81, the learned judge, delivering the judgment of the court, said: "Where a person having a desire to do to another an unlawful injury drinks intoxicating liquors to nerve himself to the commission of the crime, intoxication is held, and properly, to aggravate the offense; but at present the rule that intoxication aggravates crime is confined to cases of that class. . . . But in many cases, evidence of intoxication is admissible with a view to the question whether a crime has been committed; or where a crime consisting of degrees has been committed, such evidence may be important in determining the degree." Pigman v. State, 14 Ohio, 555; Lytle v. State, 31 Ohio St. 196; Davis v. State, 25 Ohio St. 229; Roberts v. People, 10 Mich. 401; State v. Welch, 31 Minn. 22.

In the application of this principle, the Supreme Court of the United States reversed a judgment of conviction of murder in the first degree in Hopt v. Utah, 104 U. S. 681 [26 L. ed. 878]. The court below instructed the jury to the effect that "a man who voluntarily puts himself in a condition to have no control of his actions must be held to intend the consequences. The safety of the community requires this rule. Intoxication is so easily counterfeited, and when real is so often resorted to as a means of nerving a person up to the commission of some desperate act, and is withal so inexcusable in itself, that the law has never recognized it as an excuse for crime."

The accused requested the court to give an instruction similar to that requested and refused in the present case. After asserting the 8 L. R. A.

general rule of the common law, that voluntary intoxication affords no excuse, justification or extenuation of a crime committed under its influence, Mr. Justice Gray, delivering the judgment of the court, said: "But when a statute establishing different degrees of murder requires deliberate premeditation in order to constitute murder in the first degree, the question whether the accused is in such a condition of mind, by reason of drunkenness or otherwise, as to be capable of deliberate premeditation, necessarily becomes a material subject of consideration by the jury." Com. v. Derray, 108 Mass. 413; Pierce v. State, 9 Humph. (Tenn.) 662; Hails v. State, 11 Humph. 154; Jones v. Com. 73 Pa. 408; Kernan v. Com. 44 Pa. 65; People v. Valencia, 21 Cal. 544; State v. Johnson, 40 Conn. 136; Maxwell, Crim. Prac. pp. 227-230.

So in Buathannon v. Com. 68 Ky. 110, the court said: "A deliberate intent to take life is an essential element of murder. Drunkenness as a fact may therefore be proven as bearing upon its existence or nonexistence. It is not admissible upon the ground that in and of itself it excuses or mitigates the crime, because one offense cannot justify or palliate another, but because, under the circumstances of the case, it may tend to show that the less and not the greater offense was committed." See also State v. Sopher, 70 Iowa, 494.

In State v. Johnson, supra, the Supreme Court of Connecticut, in reversing a judgment of conviction of murder in the first degree, the court below having given and refused instructions similar to those involved in the present case, used the following language: "A deliberate intent to take life is an essential element of the offense. The existence of such an intent must be shown as a fact. Implied malice is sufficient, at common law, to make the offense murder, but under our Statute, to make it murder in the first degree, actual malice must be proved. Upon this question, the state of the prisoner's mind is material. In behalf of the defense, insanity, intoxication or any other fact which tends to prove that the prisoner was incapable of deliberation, was competent evidence for the jury to weigh. Intoxication is admissible in such cases, not as an excuse for crime, or in mitigation of punishment, but as tending to show that the less and not the greater offense was in fact committed." State v. Johnson, 41 Conn. 535; Jones v. State, 29 Ga. 594.

"In those States," says a learned author, "in which murder has been divided by statute into degrees, it has been held that if the accused was intoxicated to such an extent as to deprive him of the power to form a design, the offense could be no more than murder in the second degree." Lawson, Insanity, p. 74; 1 Wharton, Crim. Law, § 51, 63.

"Drunkenness, we have seen, does not incapacitate one to commit either murder or manslaughter at the common law," says Mr. Bishop, "because to constitute either the specific intent to take life need not exist, but general malevolence is sufficient. But where murder is divided by statute into two degrees, and to constitute it in the first degree there must be the specific intent to take life, the specific intent does not in fact exist, and the murder is not in this degree where one, not meaning to commit homicide, becomes so drunk as to be incapable of intending to do it and then kills a man." Bishop, Cr. L. § 404.

This court, although not always unerring in its with entire accuracy, has constantly recognized the rule declared in the above cases. Thus, in Swann v. State, 88 Ind. 504, where it appeared that the accused was excited by intoxicating drink at the time of the homicide, an instruction was approved as accurately expressing the law, in which the jury were told that "voluntary intoxication is no excuse for crime as long as the offender is capable of conceiving an intelligent design."

So in Fisher v. State, 64 Ind. 435, a prosecution for larceny, after stating the general rule that voluntary intoxication is no excuse for crime, unless the habit has been indulged to such an extent as to pervert or destroy the mental faculties, the court said: "There are cases which hold that, in prosecutions for murder, drunkenness at the time may be shown as affecting the question of premeditation." Dawson v. State, 18 Ind. 425; Bradley v. State, 81 Ind. 404; Rogers v. State, 88 Ind. 843; Chest v. State, 40 Ind. 203; Bailey v. State, 36 Ind. 432; Robinson v. State, 118 Ind. 510, 12 West. Rep. 309.

When a homicide results from the use of a dangerous and deadly weapon, the law implies malice and an intention to kill from the effective use of the weapon, and therefore the crime is presumably murder in the second degree. No degree of mental disturbance produced by voluntary intoxication will of itself, disconnected from sudden heat or other circumstances, avail to reduce the crime to a lower grade, unless such a diseased condition of the mind has followed the habit of intoxication as to render the accused incapable of distinguishing between right and wrong, or of controlling his conduct when free from the influence of intoxicating drink. But in the absence of evidence, either direct or circumstantial, there is no presumption from the mere fact that a homicide was committed, except it be in the perpetration of the offenses mentioned in the statute, that it was done with deliberation or premeditated malice. Hence the conclusion logically follows that murder in the first degree, in which, under our Statute, premeditated malice is the distinguishing ingredient, can only be committed by one possessed of the mental capacity to deliberate and premeditate, and that a homicide committed by one who was at the time for any reason incapacitated to think deliberately or determine rationally as to the quality, character and consequences of the act, cannot be murder in the first degree. Reg. v. Davis, 14 Cox, Cr. Cas. 508, 20 Eng. Rep. (Woolk's notes) 637.

In order that there may be no misapprehension and to prevent voluntary intoxication from being used as a cloak to shield those who, from sheer wickedness of heart and regardless of consequences, allow themselves to be driven to the commission of crimes, it should be said that mere intoxication, in the absence of such mental incapacity resulting therefrom as renders one who takes the life of another incapable of thinking deliberately and meditating rationally upon the purpose to take human life, and which leaves him with full power to know the quality of his act and to abstain from doing it, cannot of itself be regarded as sufficient to reduce a homicide from murder in the first to murder in the second degree. Walker v. State, 86 Ala. 7, 7 Am. St. Rep. 17; 1 Bishop, Cr. L. § 410.

"In other words, there must be the absence of that self-determining power which, in a sane mind, renders it conscious of the real nature of its own purposes and capable of resisting wrong impulses. Where this self-governing power is wanting, whether it is caused by insanity, gross intoxication or other controlling influences, it cannot be said truthfully that the mind is fully conscious of its own purposes and deliberates or premeditates, in the sense of the act describing murder in the first degree." Jones v. Com. supra.

Drunkenness cannot be considered as an excuse for crime, but may be taken into consideration for the purpose solely of passing on the fact of premeditation, keeping in view the fact that a man may act with premeditation while under the influence of intoxicating liquor, or he may have harbored the design to commit the crime before becoming intoxicated. People v. Williams, 43 Cal. 345, State v. Robinson, 20 W. Va. 713, 43 Am. Rep. 799.

It seems scarcely necessary to add that we are not dealing with the question of voluntary intoxication as an excuse for crime, or as rendering the accused criminally irresponsible, but only with intoxication resulting in that degree of mental disturbance or distortion that renders the accused incapable of committing murder in the first degree.

By giving the 12th instruction the court gave full recognition to the fact that the subject of the voluntary intoxication of the accused was before the jury for consideration. The jury were told, correctly enough, with what abhorrence the law looked upon freeray arising solely from jealousy and anger, and from wicked and ungovernable passions, which did not result from mental lesion. They were also told, with eminent propriety, that the condition of mind which usually and immediately follows the excessive use of alcoholic liquors is not the unsoundness of mind meant by our law, and that voluntary drunkenness did not excuse or palliate crime.

These instructions were all well enough as far as they went, but the question back of all that was, whether drunkenness, if it existed to the extent of depriving the accused of the power of deliberation, might be considered by the jury as disproving an essential ingredient in the crime of murder in the first degree, viz., the deliberate intention to take human life.

When the accused asked the court to instruct the jury that voluntary intoxication might, in case a mental condition had resulted therefrom which incapacitated him from deliberate thought or rational determination, reduce the crime from the highest to a lower grade of murder, the court refused. The jury were then left without the means of distinguishing between voluntary intoxication as an excuse for crime and intoxication as affecting that particular condition of mind necessary to constitute the crime of murder in the first degree. After admitting evidence tending to show that the accused was in the habit of drinking alcoholic stimulants, and that he had drunk to excess on the day of the homicide, the jury were not only told that drunkenness was not only no excuse or palliation for crime, but without any explanation they were left to infer that if it had any effect, it was to aggravate the offense. Either the jury must have excluded the evidence of intoxication from their minds altogether, or they must have given it an effect prejudicial to the accused. The jury may have believed, as did the court, that although the accused may not have had the mental capacity to think deliberately or determine rationally, if his incapacity resulted from voluntary intoxication, he might be guilty of murder in the first degree nevertheless. In the absence of any claim of preconceived design, it was therefore prejudicial error to refuse the instruction asked, which contains an accurate statement of the law.

The court of its own motion charged the jury as follows: "The defense of insanity is one very frequently made in cases of this kind, and it is one which, I may say to you, should be very carefully scrutinized by the jury. The evidence to this point should be carefully considered and weighed by the jury, for the reason that if the accused was in truth insane at the time of the commission of the alleged acts, then he ought not to be punished for such acts. The evidence on this question of insanity ought to be carefully considered by the jury for another reason, and that is, because a due regard for the ends of justice and the peace and welfare of society demands it, to the end that parties charged with crime may not make use of the plea of insanity to defeat the ends of justice and as a shield to protect them from criminal responsibility in case of violation of law."

This instruction met with unqualified approval in Sawyer v. State, 85 Ind. 80, and the principle therein enunciated has been referred to approvingly in Sanders v. State, 94 Ind. 147, and Battler v. State, 97 Ind. 878.

It can hardly be said to contain the statement of any proposition of law, but is rather in the nature of a general disparagement of the defense of insanity which the accused had pleaded as provided by statute. A case might possibly arise in which such a statement could be appropriately made by the court. As the judgment in the present case must be reversed for other reasons, we do not determine whether or not it constituted reversible error in this case. It is sufficient to say that, as at present constituted, the court does not regard with favor any statements by the trial court which are designed to cast discredit or suspicion upon any defense which is recognized by the law as legitimate, and which an accused person is making in apparent good faith. In this respect we are unable to appreciate any well-grounded distinction between the defense of insanity, self-defense or alibi. Leas v. State, 81 Ind. 172; Baker v. State, 86 Ind. 878; Albin v. State, 88 Ind. 300; Simmons v. State, 61 Minn. 242; Dowson v. State, 69 Minn. 241; Thompson, Trials, § 2400.

In those jurisdictions where judges are permitted to comment upon the weight and value of evidence, it has been held proper for the court to caution the jury concerning a defense which judicial experience has shown to be often attempted by contrivance and perjury. Com. v. Webster, 8 Cush. 205, Thompson, Trials, § 2434.

This rule does not prevail in Indiana. Unruh v. State, 105 Ind. 117, 2 West. Rep. 682.

At the proper time the court was requested to give instructions numbered 10 and 11, which are in the following language:

"10. The court presumes the defendant to be innocent of the commission of any crime. And this presumption continues in his favor throughout the trial of the cause, step by step; and you cannot find the accused guilty of any of the crimes covered by the indictment until the evidence in the cause satisfies you beyond a reasonable doubt of his guilt. And so long as you, or any one of you, have a reasonable doubt as to the existence of any of the several elements necessary to constitute the several crimes above defined, the accused cannot be convicted of such crime.

"11. And here the court instructs you that the mere fact that a grand jury has returned an indictment against the accused does not raise any presumption that the accused has been guilty of any crime, and you must not take the filing of the indictment as raising any such presumption until you, and each of you, are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt, by the evidence here introduced before you, without reference to the nature of the indictment, that the accused is guilty of some of the grades of homicide covered by this indictment, there can be no conviction."

The court declined to give either of the above, and it is conceded that the subjects embraced therein were not covered by the general charge.

In Castle v. State, 78 Ind. 146, a judgment of conviction for an assault and battery with intent to commit murder was reversed for no other reason than the refusal of the court to give an instruction substantially like that numbered 10 above. While we might hesitate to reverse a judgment which was correct in all other respects, we can see no good reason why such an instruction should be refused when seasonably requested, unless the subject of the individual responsibility of each juror has been adequately covered in some other charge.

There was no error in refusing the 11th charge. It must be assumed that the jury understood from the general charge of the court that the law surrounded the accused with the presumption of innocence notwithstanding the return of an indictment against him, and that that presumption continued until it was overcome by the evidence. It must be assumed that jurors are men of ordinary intelligence and that they are possessed of the information common to well informed citizens.

After the most careful consideration of the instructions, we are impressed with the conviction that too many doubtful questions were resolved against the accused, and that prejudicial error may have intervened in the failure of the court to give the jury the instructions requested upon the subject of the mental incapacity of the accused, resulting from voluntary intoxication, to commit the crime of murder in the first degree. A judgment of a court which pronounces the extreme penalty of the law upon a human being should be free from any error which may have resulted to the prejudice of the person condemned. Let the one before us say, for the reasons given, not be, it is reversed.

The clerk will make the proper order concerning the appellant.

Elliott, J.:

The 19th instruction disapproved by the court is copied word for word from the instruction given in the case of Sawyer v. State, 33 Ind. 80. Worden, J., delivering the unanimous opinion of the court in that case said: "The observations of the court in that respect meet our unqualified approval. As stated by the court, where the defense of insanity is interposed to a criminal prosecution, the evidence relating to it should be carefully and intelligently scrutinized and considered for the double reason that a really insane person should not be convicted, and a really sane one should not be acquitted and suffered to go unpunished for his crimes on the false theory of insanity." This is, as I am unalterably convinced, sound sense and sound law. If the decision stood alone I should be heartily for sustaining it, for I believe that it is intrinsically right. But it does not stand alone, for it has been repeatedly approved. Butler v. State, 37 Ind. 378; Sanders v. State, 34 Ind. 147; Guetig v. State, 63 Ind. 278.

Other courts have declared a like doctrine. People v. Bumberger, 45 Cal. 650; People v. Dennis, 39 Cal. 635; Sellick's Case, 1 City Hall Rec. 185; McKee v. People, 35 N. Y. 118.

In one of the cases cited the jury were instructed, as to the defense of insanity, that, "from its nature it ought to be received in all cases by jurors with the greatest degree of caution and circumspection." In another case the jury were instructed, concerning the plea of insanity, that "it is a plea sometimes resorted to in cases where aggravated crimes have been committed under circumstances which afford full proof of overt acts, and render hopeless all other means of evading punishment. While, therefore, it ought to be received as a not less full and complete than it is a humane defense, when satisfactorily established, it yet should be examined with great care lest an ingenious counterfeit of the malady furnish protection to guilt."

It is, as is everywhere laid down, the duty of a court to abide by its decisions unless it is demonstrated that they are against reason, and this rule ought of itself to constrain us to adhere to former decisions; but in this instance I am convinced that the court is departing from a decision not only without reason, but against both reason and authority.

The departure is, I deferentially affirm, a step in the wrong direction. Our decisions have already too greatly restricted the rights and duties of trial judges, and I am firmly convinced that it is a mistake to fetter them still more. A trial judge is, as I believe, more than a mere moderator, or a mere rehearser of stereotyped phrases, for it is his right and his duty to give the jury such advice and such cautions as shall assist them in reaching a just conclusion.

That the defense of insanity is one frequently resorted to is a matter of common knowledge, and it is so treated in the text-books and decisions, and yet the instruction before us is condemned simply because the jury are informed that it is a defense that is frequently made. This, as I understand the opinion of the court, is the only infirmity in the instruction. To me it seems an element of strength, not of weakness.

Our Statute makes the defense of insanity a peculiar one. Some of the courts hold that it must be established beyond a reasonable doubt. Other courts hold that it must be established by a preponderance of the evidence, and still others hold that it is enough if the evidence raises a reasonable doubt of the sanity of the accused; but, while the courts differ upon the points mentioned, they agree that the defense of insanity is a peculiar one, subject to be abused and meriting rigid scrutiny.

While I dissent from that part of the opinion which disapproves the 19th instruction, I concur in the conclusion that the judgment should be reversed, for I think that the very able opinion of the court prepared by the chief justice unanswerably proves that where the element of premeditation is essential to create the crime of murder in the first degree, the accused cannot be found guilty of that crime if at the time of the killing he was so completely overcome by intoxication as to be incapable of premeditation.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

Orin D. VROMAN et al., Plfs. in Arr.,

George O. POWERS.

(vs Ohio St., &c.)

1. Where a verbal will is reduced to writing, and subscribed by two witnesses, one of whom is a legatee thereunder, and the other is his wife, the husband is not a competent, disinterested witness, within the meaning of section 5001 of the Revised Statutes, and the will is invalid.

2. The two witnesses to a verbal will must be competent, disinterested witnesses at the time of their attestation, and their dis-

NOTE.—WILL defined.

A will is a legal declaration of a man's intention which he wills to be performed after his death. Jasper v. Jasper, 17 Or. 380.

It is an instrument whereby a person makes a disposition of his property, to take effect after his death. Cover v. Stom, 9 Cent. Rep. 108, 37 Md. 448. 3 L. R. A.

The more general and popular denomination of a will or testament embracing both real and personal property is "last will and testament." Compton v. McMahan, 3 West. Rep. 108, 15 Mo. App. 494.

Although the statute requires a will to be in writing, yet where a will required certain property qualification as witnesses, by reason of interest under the will, cannot be removed by a renunciation of such interest at the time the will is admitted to probate, or at the trial of an issue to contest the validity of the will.

3. Section 5935 of the Revised Statutes, as to the effect of a witness being a devisee or legatee under the will, is not applicable to verbal wills.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Cuyahoga County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff rendered upon appeal from the Court of Common Pleas in an action brought to set aside a certain will upon the ground that the statutory requirements as to subscription were not complied with. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Alford, Alford & Baptiste, for plaintiffs in error:

Rev. Stat., § 5925, controls and governs in the case of nuncupative wills, as in that of wills generally, and under its provisions Orris D. Vroman was in the very moment that he signed the will by operation of law stripped of all interest and wholly divested of the same, and thus became a disinterested witness.

The Statute divesting the husband of all interest, at the same instant divested the wife of all interest; so that she was the competent, disinterested witness named in the Statute.

If the provisions of that Statute did not so operate the filing of the written renunciation and release did; and thereafter for the purposes of making the will a valid verbal last will as it pertained to the other legatees therein named, they were both competent, disinterested witnesses.

Dickman, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Mary A. Powers, the wife of the defendant in error, George O. Powers, died on the 18th day of December, 1881, leaving issue one child, Orris Irving Powers, who thereafter, and before this suit was begun, died aged six months. It was claimed that Mary A. Powers, in her last sickness, made a verbal will, which was on the 18th day of December, 1881, reduced to writing, and subscribed by Orris D. Vroman and his wife Emma J. Vroman as witnesses. The alleged verbal will was presented to and admitted to probate by the Probate Court of Cuyahoga County. By the terms of the will, Orris D. Vroman, Joseph Vroman, Albert K. Vroman and Adiram Vroman, the plaintiffs in error, brothers of Mary A. Powers, and Orris Irving Powers are named as the several legatees given to a person named to be distributed by him "according to private instructions I give him;" which instructions were verbal and directed payment of the property, which is in a foreign country, to relatives in that country,—equity will carry out the intention by charging the legatee with a constructive trust in favor of the beneficiaries named in the private instructions to him, as against the other heirs; and he will not be charged with a trust in favor of the latter. Curdy v. Barton, 79 Cal. 60.

Nuncupative will; rule in various States.

A nuncupative will must be strictly proved in all essential points. Scatte v. Emmons (Ga.) March 12, 1891.

To render a nuncupative will valid, it must appear that the deceased was in extremis when he made it; and it is invalid where deceased had plenty of time and opportunity to execute a formal written will. Ibid.

One of the formalities required by the Louisiana Civil Code in the confectio of a testament nuncupative is L. R. A.

in form and received by public act is that the act must be received by a notary in the presence of three witnesses residing in the parish where the instrument is made. This formality must be observed; otherwise the testament is null and void. Welch v. Henne (La.) Dec. 17, 1893.

Nuncupative testaments are full proof of themselves. They must bear upon their faces the evidence that all the formalities required by law have been complied with. An omission of any formality cannot be supplied by evidence dehors the testament. Ibid.

If executed before two competent witnesses only it is invalid; and if executed before three witnesses, one of whom did not understand the language in which the will was drawn up and the testator expressed himself, it is invalid. Dauterive's Succession, 39 La. Ann. 1022.

A nuncupative will under private signature need not be shown to have been dictated by the testator when written out of the presence of the witness. Pfarr v. Delmont, 39 La. Ann. 294.

A verbal will, to be valid, must be proved by three witnesses present at the making thereof, and of Mary A. Powers. Suit was brought by George O. Powers, in the court of common pleas, against the plaintiffs in error, to set aside the will, on the ground, among others, that it was not subscribed by two competent, disinterested witnesses. The case was tried in the court of common pleas in May, 1884, and by verdict and judgment of the court the will was set aside. The defendants appealed, and on February 15, 1887, the case was tried in the circuit court, and it was found by the verdict and judgment rendered therein that the paper purporting to be the last will of Mary A. Powers was not her last will. During the trial in the circuit court, a written renunciation of all interest under the will, made and signed February 12, 1887, by Orris D. Vroman and Emma J. Vroman, the two witnesses to the alleged verbal will, was filed in that court, which renunciation, on being offered in evidence, was ruled out by the court.

The court, among other matters, charged the jury as follows: "That if they should find from the evidence that one of said witnesses to said will, Orris D. Vroman, was the brother of the testatrix and one of the residuary legatees mentioned in said alleged will, and that said Emma J. Vroman was at the time the wife of the said Orris D. Vroman, the said witnesses to said will were not, within the meaning of the Statute of Ohio, competent, disinterested witnesses to said will, and because of that fact said will would not be the valid verbal will of the said Mary A. Powers."

It is contended in behalf of the plaintiffs in error that the circuit court erred, first, in charging the jury that Orris D. Vroman and Emma J. Vroman, under the conditions above stated, would not be competent and disinterested witnesses, within the meaning of the Statute; and second, in refusing to allow the paper containing their renunciation of interest to be put in evidence.

I. It is provided by section 5001, of the Revised Statutes that "a verbal will, made in the last sickness, shall be valid in respect to personal property, if reduced to writing, and subscribed by two competent disinterested witnesses, within ten days after the speaking of the testamentary words; and if it be proved by said witnesses that the testator was of sound mind and memory, and not under any restraint, and called upon some person present, at the time the testamentary words were spoken, to bear testimony to said disposition as his will." The Statute requires that both the witnesses shall be competent and disinterested, and not one only. In our judgment, Orris D. Vroman did not meet the requirement of the Statute as to competency and disinterestedness. He had a sufficiently immediate, beneficial interest in the will to disqualify him from becoming a subscribing witness thereto. The alleged will provided that a certain sum of money in the hands of her brother, Orris D. Vroman, belonging to the testatrix, if not used for her sickness and incident expenses, should be placed where her son could have it on arriving at the age of twenty-one years; and that if he died before the age of twenty-one years, the money should go to her brothers; and that, whatever funds were to come from her mother's estate were to go in the same manner. One of the witnesses, therefore, being incompetent and disqualified by reason of interest, there was not a compliance with the statutory requirement that the two witnesses to the verbal will should be competent and disinterested, and the will, in consequence, cannot be held to be valid. We find no error in the charge of the court.

It is urged, however, that if there was a disqualification of interest in one or both of the witnesses, it was removed by the operation of section 5025 of the Revised Statutes, which provides that "if a devise or bequest is given to a person who is a witness to the will, and be made in the last sickness of the testator. The term "last sickness" means in extremis. Carroll v. Bonham, 8 Cont. Rep. 448, 45 N. J. Eq. 685.

If decedent could have made a written will, a nuncupative one will be of no avail, and where he lived nine days after, deliberately selecting the nuncupative method, such will cannot be admitted to probate. Ibid.

Under N. C. Code § 2143, a nuncupative will which is put in writing within ten days after it is made, may be proved by the witnesses thereof, either before or after the lapse of six months next after it is made; and where the proofs and examination of the witnesses are taken, and an order of citation and publication of notice made within the six months, the proceeding cannot be dismissed because the will is not admitted to probate within the six months. Re Haygood's Will, 101 N. C. 54.

The Texas statute authorizing any person who is competent to make a will, to "dispose of his property by nuncupative will," does not apply to real property. It must be considered as intending to re-enact the former law on the subject. McFett v. Moffett, 67 Tex. 642.

Qualification of witness.

Where the statute requires "at least two credible witnesses" it means persons not disqualified by § L. R. A.

mental imbecility, interest or crime. Fuller v. Fuller, 85 Ky. 244.

A statute providing that a bequest shall be void when made to a subscribing witness, or the husband or wife of such, does not make void a charitable bequest for the poor of a religious society to which the subscribing witnesses belong. Goodrich's App. 57 Conn. 273.

A husband is not disqualified, on account of his interest, to act as a subscribing witness to a will, on the ground that his wife is named therein as a devisee of real estate. Harris v. Offutt, 10 Iowa, 242.

Prior to Statute of 1881, a will was void when one of three witnesses was the husband of one of the legatees. Giddings v. Turgeon, 2 New Eng. Rep. 468, 58 Vt. 106.

Where the will contains a devise or legacy to a town, in trust, a taxpaying inhabitant of the town is not thereby rendered an incompetent witness to the will. Re Marston, 2 New Eng. Rep. 601, 70 Me. 23.

Where the will contains a legacy to an incorporated ball association, "in part to secure a liberal policy in respect to the use of the ball for objects of public interest," a stockholder in that association is not thereby rendered an incompetent witness to the will. Ibid.

the will cannot otherwise be proved than by the testimony of such witness, the devise or bequest shall be void, and the witness shall be competent to give testimony of the execution of the will, in like manner as if such devise or bequest had not been made."

This section, when considered in connection with the preceding sections of the chapter, including section 5916, is clearly applicable only to duly executed written wills. Section 5919 requires that "every last will and testament (except nuncupative wills hereinafter provided for) shall be in writing, and signed at the end thereof by the party making the same . . . and shall be attested and subscribed in the presence of such party by two or more competent witnesses," etc.

The sections immediately following, embracing section 5925, are so connected by obvious reference to a will in writing, as to preclude the idea of applying the last-mentioned section to nuncupative wills, which, by the Statute, are assigned to a separate and distinct class, and are subject to different requisites and conditions.

Section 5925 in providing that "the witness shall be competent to give testimony in the execution of the will," evidently refers to the full, legal formalities of a signature by the testator, and an attestation by competent witnesses who subscribe in the testator's presence, and not, as in a nuncupative will, to the testator's speaking testamentary words in his last sickness, which are to be reduced to writing and subscribed by competent and disinterested witnesses, within ten days after the words are spoken.

II. The renouncement and release by Orris D. Vroman of all right and interest was not filed until more than five years after the verbal will is alleged to have been made. Such a release did not remove his disqualification as a witness. The Statute contemplates the verbal will as made in the last sickness. Within ten days after the speaking of the testamentary words, the will must be reduced to writing, and subscribed by two witnesses who are then competent and disinterested.

The rule, it is said, which reason should now pronounce the universal one, is that the competency of witnesses, like that of the testator, is tested by one's status at the time when the will was executed. Schouler, Wills, § 351.

In Patten v. Tallman, 37 Ma. 27, the court says: "The competency of an attesting witness is not to be determined upon the state of facts existing at the time when the will is presented for probate, but upon those existing at the time of the attestation."

In Morton v. Ingram, 11 Ired. L. 368, it was held, that a person named as executor is not competent as an attesting witness to a will of personalty; and that his subsequent renunciation and release will not make him so; and that he must be disinterested at the time of attestation.

In Huse v. McConnell, 2 Jones, L. 455, the court remarks: "It is well settled that an attesting witness to a will must be competent at the time of attestation, and that no subsequent release, where the objection is one of interest, can restore competency."

In Workman v. Dominick, 8 Strobb. L. 539, it was held that "credible" means competent; and the competency of the witness must be referred to the time of attestation. Frost, J., said: "This point is settled. It is affirmed by all the elementary writers. . . . If the witnesses do not possess, at the time of the execution of the will, the quality required, it cannot afterwards be supplied. If any of them be not then credible, by reason of a benefit he may take by the instrument, he cannot be made credible by a future release. . . . The will would be absolutely in the power of the witness. If he consents to release, the will is established; if he refuses, the will is annulled. It is in his power to set up the estate at auction between the legatees and next of kin, and sell it to the highest bidder. And thus, being first bribed by an interest in the will to make it, he is open to another bribe to vacate it."

See Stewart v. Harriman, 50 N. H. 25; Hawes v. Humphrey, 9 Pick. 350; Higgins v. Carlton, 28 Md. 115; Pease v. Allen, 110 Mass. 157; Allison v. Allison, 4 Hawks, 141; Tucker v. Tucker, 5 Ired. L. 161; Greenl. Ev. § 691.

The rule laid down in the above citations acquires additional force and significance when applied to the attestation and establishment of verbal wills. The rule, it is true, in its application to wills in writing, is controlled by section 5925 of the Revised Statutes, but that section, as we have before observed, is not applicable to nuncupative wills.

Judgment affirmed.

FREEMAN'S NATIONAL BANK

NATIONAL TUBE WORKS CO.

(....Mass....)

1. The owner of drafts, who indorses them in blank and places them with a bank for collection.

NOTE.—Indorsement of note or bill deposited for collection.

A special indorsement "For collection" on a promissory note does not transfer the ownership § L. R. A.

may avail himself of the benefit of a restrictive indorsement placed thereon by such bank when it transmitted them to its correspondent for the purpose of effecting such collection.

2. The legal title to commercial paper indorsed "For collection" passes only so far as to enable the indorsee to demand, receive of the note or its proceeds to the indorsee. Sweeney v. Baster, 68 U. S. 1 Wall 166 (17 L. ed. 621).

Where a bank on its own proposition enters into an arrangement with another bank, whereby it and sue for the money to be paid; upon such indorsement the owner may control his paper until it is paid, and may intercept the proceeds thereof in the hands of an intermediate agent.

3. A bank's indorsement of commercial paper directing payment "for account of itself" does not imply that it is the owner of the paper, where the indorsement of the bank from which its title was derived was of the same kind.

4. A bank to which commercial paper has been transmitted for collection will not be permitted to dispute the right of the owner to stop payment thereof, although it has made credits or advances to an intermediate collecting agent on account of the paper, if the same were made before the paper had been collected; nor can such advances be recovered from the owner as money paid for his use.

REPORT from the Supreme Judicial Court for Suffolk County (C. Allen, J.) for the opinion of the full court of an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due upon certain accepted drafts, the payment of which had been stopped by the owner. Judgment for defendant.

undertakes to collect all paper sent it by the latter, and to transmit the proceeds at or upon designated dates; and, in addition to such agency and services, all paper transmitted for collection contains a special or restrictive indorsement, the form of which is suggested by the collecting bank, directing payment to the latter for the transmitting bank, and stating that the paper was to be collected at par and the proceeds remitted to the transmitting bank on specified dates, without exchange,—the relation thus created, both as respects the paper and the proceeds thereof after collection, is that of principal and agent, and not of debtor and creditor. Commercial Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, 30 Fed. Rep. 684; Farmer's Bank v. Owen, 3 Cranch, C. C. 394.

Where a banker has received from his correspondent a draft indorsed for collection, which is indorsed in like manner to his correspondent, he cannot appropriate the proceeds collected thereon to the latter's debt to himself, and refuse to pay the owner. *City Bank v. Rep. 337.

An indorsement by a collecting agent of a check sent to him for collection, without using the word "agent," is, in behalf of his principal, an indorsement merely for the purpose of collection, and is not a guaranty of the genuineness of the check. National City Bank v. Westcott, 118 N. Y. 484.

The indorsement of the words "For collection," on invoices accompanying bills of lading attached as collateral security to drafts discounted, implies no guaranty of the genuineness of the bills. Goss v. Kansas City Bank, 119 U. S. 351 (30 L. ed. 513).

An indorsee of a promissory note for collection has such a title as will enable him to sue thereon in his own name, though he paid nothing for the note. Roberts v. Parrish, 17 Or. 333; Roberts v. Snow (Neb.) Oct. 3, 1880.

The National Tube Works Company operated mills at McKeesport, Pa., and had an office in Boston, where the treasurer was located and the finances of the Company were kept. For the purpose of paying the running expenses of the mills it was in the habit of drawing drafts on the treasurer in Boston, and depositing them with the People's Bank of McKeesport, of which O. R. Stuckelager was cashier, for collection.

This suit was brought upon two of these drafts, which were alike with the exception that the amounts were different. There was also a count upon an account annexed for $7,000 for money paid to defendant's use, and interest thereon, being the amount paid by plaintiff to the Penn Bank, under date May 20, 1884.

The following is a copy of one of the drafts: $30,000. McKeesport, Pa., May 17, 1884.

At sight for value received, pay to the order of A. Chaudon twenty thousand dollars and charge this office as per margin.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Acknowledged.

The drafts were received by the Freeman's Bank May 19, and were accepted by the defendant the same day.

May 20 the Penn-Bank check for $7,000 reached the Freeman's Bank through the Boston Clearing House and was paid.

The drafts, when received by the Freeman's Bank, were entered upon its collection book, but have never been entered upon its account current or upon any other book or account to the credit of the Penn Bank.

On the 21st or 22d of May the Penn Bank failed, and the defendant's treasurer was notified by the People's Bank and the manager of the National Tube Works at McKeesport not to pay the same. Payment was accordingly refused on presentation on May 22, and this suit was thereupon commenced.

Messrs. W. G. Russell and Jabez Fox, for plaintiff:

The legal title at least passed by the indorsement "Pay Penn Bank or order for account of the People's Bank."

First Nat. Bank v. Smith, 183 Mass. 227; Murrow v. Stuart, 8 Moore, P. C. 267.

A second restrictive indorsement like that of the Penn Bank in the present case is just as unequivocal an assertion of title in the second indorser as if it stood alone.

Merchants Nat. Bank v. Hanson, 83 Minn. 40, cited in Manufacturers Nat. Bank v. Continental Bank, 2 L. R. A. 699, 148 Mass. 558.

The fact that the indorsement of the Penn Bank was restrictive would not prevent the title from passing to the plaintiff to secure the sum advanced.

not the usage of the bank to consider the bill dishonored in such a case. Ibid.

A bank receiving for collection drafts drawn against shipments of cattle, on which payment is refused, and which fails to send notice of such refusal for more than twenty-four hours, cannot appropriate the proceeds of the cattle, which it collects for the drawee of such drafts, to his indebtedness to the bank on overdrafts. Gillespie v. Union Stockyards Nat. Bank, 41 Fed. Rep. 231.

The bank is responsible for the amount of the bill in case of its negligence as to notice of presentment and nonpayment. Allen v. Suydam, 20 Wend. 821; Borup v. Nininger, 5 Minn. 523; Chicopee Bank v. Seventh Nat. Bank, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 641 (19 L. ed. 422); Essex County Nat. Bank v. Bank of Montreal, 15 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 418; *Woolen v. New York & E. Liability of agent of collecting bank.

The bank receiving the note for collection, and not its agent, is liable to the owner. Hyde v. First Nat. Bank, 7 Biss. 152.

Where a person goes to a bank, in the ordinary course of business dealing, and intrusts to it the collection of a draft drawn upon some person residing at a distance, and the home bank, through the failure or dishonesty of another bank selected by itself to make the collection, never receives the money paid on such draft by the drawee, in the absence of any agreement in regard to the matter, the home bank is liable to the customer for the loss of the money. Simpson v. Waldbay, 8 West. Rep. 158, 68 Mich. 439.

If a collecting bank surrenders a check to a bank on which it is drawn, and accepts a cashier's check or other obligation in lieu thereof, its liability to its depositor is fixed as much as if it had received the cash. Fifth Nat. Bank v. Ashworth, 2 L. R. A. 491, 123 Pa. 212.

If it employs some other bank or individual to collect the bill the latter becomes the agent of the former bank, and not of the owner, to which it is answerable for neglect of its duty as agent. Commercial Bank v. Union Bank, 11 N. Y. 208; Montgomery County Bank v. Albany City Bank, 7 N. Y. 459; Merchants & M. Bank v. Stafford Nat. Bank, 44 Conn. 564; Reeves v. State Bank, 8 Ohio St. 425; Hoover v. Wise, 91 U. S. 308 (23 L. ed. 392).

If a party sends a bill of exchange to his agent for collection, who remits it to a sub-agent, living in the same place with the drawee, who receives the money, the holder of the bill can recover the money of the sub-agent. If the sub-agent has made no advances and given no new credit to the

A banker who has advanced money to another has a lien upon all the securities in his hands, including paper deposited for collection, to secure the amount of such advance.

It cannot be said that the People's Bank, by permitting the Penn Bank to make this assertion of its own title and to put upon the drafts this direction to collect for its own account, gave that bank a less extensive authority to deal with them than it would have had under a power of attorney "to sell, indorse and assign" the securities "on behalf" of its principal, and yet it has been held that under such a power the agent could pledge the securities for a loan upon his private account.

Bank of Bengal v. Pagan, 7 Moore, P. C. 61.

It could be no departure from the line of agency for the plaintiff to remit to the Penn Bank in advance of collection, and to rely upon the security of these drafts.

Where a person had purchased goods from a broker and had paid for them in part by an advance on his general account before the delivery of the goods, such payments would be allowed as against the principal, "if it was the usual practice for payments to be made from time to time, sometimes to a smaller and sometimes to a larger amount than was actually due at the time."

Cutler v. Hindle, L. R. 3 Q. B. 268; Nash v. Kempton, 7 Q. B. 602; Warner v. M'Kay, 1 Mees. & W. 501.

The money was paid to the defendant's use and at his request and we can recover independently of any question of title to the drafts.

If a bill be indorsed "For the use of" or "For account of" the indorser, it is a restrictive indorsement, and is not an assignment of the security, but merely an authority to collect. The title to the bill does not pass to the indorsee, and such indorsee cannot indorse the bill so as to pass any interest in it.

White v. Miners Nat. Bank, 109 U. S. 658 (36 L. ed. 250); Rice v. Stearns, 8 Mass. 225, 237; Wilson v. Holmes, 5 Mass. 543; Sigourney v. Lloyd, 8 Barn. & C. 623; Rock County Nat. Bank v. Hollister, 31 Minn. 385; Third Nat. Bank v. Clark, 28 Minn. 263; Lawrence v. Russell, 77 Pa. 460; Williams v. Stoddell, 1 Cahabé & Ellis, 529; 2 Ames, Bills and Notes, index, p. 337.

The Freeman's Bank had notice from the form of the indorsements that the Penn Bank had no interest in the drafts, and that the authority of the Penn Bank to collect might be revoked at any time before the maturity of the drafts. Therefore, if it paid the $7,000 in reliance on acceptances, it acted at its peril.

Treuttel v. Barandon, 8 Taunt. 100.

The People's Bank, having received the drafts simply as agents to collect, indorses them "Pay Penn Bank or order for account of People's Bank." This was a restrictive indorsement, and neither the Penn Bank nor any subsequent indorsee could claim to be holder for value without notice as against the National Tube Works, the real owners of the paper.

agent on account of the remittance of the bill, he cannot protect himself against such an action by passing the amount of the bill to the general credit of the agent, although the agent may be his debtor. Wilson v. Smith, 44 U. S. 5 How. 723 (11 L. ed. 320).

In New York, a collecting agent to whom paper sent to be collected at some place remote from his place of business has no implied authority to employ a sub-agent in the locality of the payee, and, without some express understanding to that effect or qualifying his liability, is deemed to make such selection and employment of another on his own account, and is alone chargeable for the conduct of the latter. Nasir v. First Nat. Bank, 118 N. Y. 422.

Where, upon a bank's agreement to transmit money to a person in a distant city, plaintiff makes with it a special deposit of the amount for that purpose, and receives a letter of advice directed to a bank in that city, to the effect that the latter's account is credited with the money for the use of the one to whom it is to go, plaintiff may recover back the deposit in case the correspondent bank fails before receiving the letter, which is returned with the amount unpaid; and the fact that the money is credited to the account of the correspondent bank on the books of the bank of deposit is immaterial. See note to Cutler v. American Exch. Nat. Bank (N. Y.) 4 L. R. A. 322.

A bank holding an assignment of a policy of insurance to collect it and pay certain claims, including one of its own, therefrom, and pay the balance to the insured or his order, cannot be held liable on an order which it has accepted to be paid out of the balance, if, in the exercise of reasonable diligence and in good faith, it has settled the suit to collect the insurance for the amount merely of its own claim, after notice to the person holding the order who made no move or proposition to prosecute the suit. Meyer v. Farmers & T. Bank, 77 Iowa, 222.

Where a check was sent to a company for collection, of which fact the drawee was advised by the indorsement upon it, and the collecting company received the money from the drawee, and, prior to the time of the discovery of the fraudulent character of the check, gave the money to the company from which it was received for collection, the collecting company is not liable to the drawee as for money paid by mistake. National City Bank v. Westcott, 115 N. Y. 422.

The plaintiff may rely on the restrictive indorsement made by its agent, the People's Bank, although it had indorsed the drafts in blank.

"For the use of" or "For the account of" the indorsee, or equivalent words, is the simplest and most direct way of expressing a restrictive indorsement, and such has universally been their construction.

Knowlton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The indorsement from the defendant to the People's Bank, although in terms unrestricted, was without consideration, and merely for the purpose of collection. The People's Bank became the agent of the defendant, and the defendant, as owner of the drafts, can avail itself of all that its agent did for its protection. The subsequent indorsements through which the drafts came to the plaintiff were both restrictive, giving notice that the ownership had not passed beyond the People's Bank. They purported to be made only for the purpose of collection on account of the owner, and they merely passed the legal title so far as to enable the indorsee to demand, receive and sue for the money to be paid. First Nat. Bank v. Smith, 122 Mass. 227.

It is well settled that upon such an indorsement the owner may control his negotiable paper until it is paid, and may intercept the proceeds of it in the hands of an intermediate agent. Manufacturers Nat. Bank v. Continental Bank, 148 Mass. 552, 2 L. R. A. 699, and cases there cited.

The indorsement of the Penn National Bank, taken in connection with the former indorsement of the People's Bank, did not by the words "For account of Penn Bank," imply that the Penn Bank was the owner. It was a request to pay "For account of" the Penn Bank as agent of the People's Bank. An unbroken succession of such indorsements would indicate that each indorsee was acting by the direction of the next preceding indorser who was himself an agent of the owner who had before indorsed and for whom the collection was to be made.

Nothing was shown in the course of business of either of the banks necessarily to conflict with the implication to be derived from the form of the indorsements. The letter of the People's Bank, in which the drafts were sent to the Penn Bank, was simply, "We inclose for collection and credit" the drafts, describing them. The Penn Bank in its reply said, "We enter for collection" the drafts described, "to be used when paid." The drafts when received by the Freeman's Bank were entered upon its collection book, but have never been entered upon its account current, or upon any other book of account to the credit of the Penn Bank.

It has so long been held by the courts that an indorsement of this kind is restrictive, protecting the rights of the owner, that officers of banks must be presumed to have well understood the law, and, when they have honored overdrafts drawn by other banks which had sent paper for collection, must have done it trusting in part to the financial soundness of their correspondent, and in part to the probability that the drafts would be paid, and not to a supposed legal right to control the drafts against the owner. Rice v. Stearns, 3 Mass. 225, 227; Wilson v. Holmes, 5 Mass. 543; Treutzel v. Barandon, 8 Taunt. 100; Sigourney v. Lloyd, 8 Barn. & C. 623; Leary v. Blanchard, 48 Me. 200; Stearny v. Easter, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 166 (17 L. ed. 681); Bank of Washington v. Triplett, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 26 (7 L. ed. 87); Lawrence v. Stonington Bank, 6 Conn. 521; Bank of Metropolis v. New England Bank, 48 U. S. 1 How. 224 (11 L. ed. 115), 47 U. S. 6 How. 213 (12 L. ed. 409).

One who collects commercial papers through the agency of banks must be held to impliedly contract that the business may be done according to their well known usages so far as to permit the money collected to be mingled with the funds of the collecting bank. Lorchester & M. Bank v. New England Bank, 1 Cush. 177.

When a payment is made to his agent and the money is put with the money of the collecting bank he has a right to receive a corresponding sum, but he loses his right to the specific fund. In the absence of directions to the contrary, the collecting bank may pay it to the bank to which it should regularly be remitted, by setting it off against a debt due from that bank and giving credit for it in the account.

Very likely authority to collect would authorize the receipt of the money from the payor before maturity if he saw fit then to pay, and remittances afterwards made, whether by actual transmissions of money or by a set-off and adjustment of accounts in the usual way, would be good against the owner. In the present case no collection was made, for payment was stopped before the draft became due. The plaintiff had no right to advance the Penn Bank $7,000, or any other sum, on account of the defendant. Its only authority was to transmit or pay by adjustment and set-off money which it received for the defendant.

We are of opinion that upon the facts reported, the action cannot be maintained.

Judgment for the defendant.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT, NORTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK.

Thomas C. COOPER

Philip D. ARMOUR et al.

(....Fed. Rep....)

1. An action for malicious prosecution will not lie in favor of one against whom an accusation has been preferred before a magistrate charging a criminal offense, if he was not apprehended and no process for his arrest was issued.

2. Although an action for libel or slander may be maintained in such case if the accusation was made with no bona fide intention of prosecuting it, yet an action brought for malicious prosecution cannot be retained and treated as one for libel and slander if the defamatory words are not set out in the complaint.

ACTION to recover damages for an alleged malicious prosecution. On plaintiff's motion for a new trial. Denied.

Defendants filed an information against plaintiff before a police justice, and made application for a warrant for plaintiff's arrest, for the alleged crime of forgery in the second degree. The justice subpoenaed witnesses to appear before him and be examined to determine whether or not the warrant should issue. Counsel appeared for the respective parties and the proceedings were conducted with all the formality of a regular trial. The justice finally refused to issue the warrant, and plaintiff thereupon brought this action to recover damages for the alleged malicious prosecution.

The action was brought on for trial before Judge Wallace and a jury, and the judge directed a verdict for defendants.

The plaintiff thereupon filed this motion for a new trial.

Messrs. Ward & Cameron, for plaintiff, in support of the motion:

Defendants inflicted a great injury on plaintiff and are liable therefor in damages in an action on the case.

See Smith v. Smith, 20 Hun, 555.

There was an actual and technical prosecution.

was any interference with the person or property of the plaintiff.

McBurney*, 3 Nott & McC. 54; Gregory v. Derby, 8 Car. & P. 749.

Wallace, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question in this case is whether an action for malicious prosecution will lie against the defendants who have preferred an accusation before a magistrate charging the plaintiff with a criminal offense, notwithstanding the plaintiff was not apprehended and no process for his arrest was issued by the magistrate.

The gist of the action of malicious prosecution is the putting of legal process in force, regularly, for the mere purpose of vexation or injury; and the inconvenience or harm resulting, naturally or directly, from the suit or prosecution, is the legal damage upon which it is founded. Some of the text-writers state that the action will lie whenever the defendant has made a charge of felony against the plaintiff with a view to induce a magistrate or tribunal to entertain it, whether any warrant or other process was issued or not. Stephens, Mal. Proc. Wood's ed. p. 8; Addison, Torts, § 856.

Actions have been maintained in the nature of conspiracy for procuring a false indictment, and even for preferring a false charge of crime upon which the grand jury refused to indict; but the only decisions cited in support of the proposition that the action of malicious prosecution will lie although a criminal proceeding has not actually been instituted by the issuing of process, where the point actually arose, are in the Nisi Prius case of Clarke v. Poston, 6 Car. & P. 423, and in the case of Dawson v. Vansandau, 11 Week. Rep. 516, in which, although no process was issued, the plaintiff was taken into custody and held for examination upon the charge. On the other hand it was said by Patterson, J., in Gregory v. Derby, 8 Car. & P. 749, where there was a charge of stealing upon which a warrant was issued against the plaintiff, "that if the party was never apprehended no action would lie; and in O'Driscoll v. McBurney, 3 Nott & McC. 54, 55, it was said: "There can be no prosecution without an arrest."

The only injury sustained by the person accused when he is not taken into custody and no process has been issued against him is to his reputation; and for such an injury the action of libel or slander is the appropriate remedy, and would seem to be the only remedy. This is the view adopted by Hare & Wallace in their notes to American Leading Cases (vol. 1, p. 178); and the learned commentators state that slander or libel is the only appropriate remedy where a charge of felony has been made and a warrant was not thereupon issued, and that malicious prosecution, and not slander or libel, is the remedy whenever a warrant has been issued. The question was fully considered by the Supreme Court of South Carolina in Heyward v. Cuthbert, 4 McCord, L. 354, whether an action for malicious prosecution would lie founded on a criminal charge upon which no process was issued against the accused, and it was adjudged that it would not. In that case the charge was in the form of an information laid before the magistrate to procure a warrant for the arrest of the plaintiff. To the same effect is the case of Knoland v. Spitzka, 43 N. Y. Super. Ct. [10 Jones & S.] 470, where the question was decided in an appellate court.

In the early case of Ram v. Lamley, Hutt. 118, it was held that an action of slander could not be maintained for an oral charge of felony made to a justice of the peace upon an application for a warrant against the plaintiff, for the reason that if words so spoken were to be held actionable "no other would come to a justice of the peace to inform him of a felony." A defamatory statement spoken or written in a legal proceeding, civil or criminal, which is pertinent and material, is so unqualifiedly privileged that its truth cannot be drawn into question or malice predicated of it in an action for slander or libel. Revis v. Smith, 18 C. B. 126; Lee v. White, 4 Sneed, 111; Garr v. Selden, 4 N. Y. 91; Hawk v. Evans, 76 Iowa, 593.

If upon considerations of public policy such an action cannot be maintained, upon the same considerations no other action should lie. Without doubt libel or slander will lie for an accusation to a magistrate when made with no bona fide intention of prosecuting it. Unless such facts can be shown by the person accused, or unless he is subjected to the vexation and expense of process against him, upon principle he ought not to be allowed to recover.

The more generally approved doctrine is that for the prosecution of a civil action maliciously and without probable cause, to the injury of the plaintiff, he may maintain an action for damages although there was no interference with his person or property. Pangburn v. Bull, 1 Wend. 345; Whipple v. Fuller, 11 Conn. 582; Glosson v. Staples, 42 Vt. 209; Eastin v. Bank of Stockton, 66 Cal. 123, 56 Am. Rep. 77; Allen v. Codman, 139 Mass. 138; Marbourn v. Smith, 11 Kan. 554, Woods v. Minnell, 18 Bush, 629; Pope v. Pollock (Ohio) 4 L. R. A. 255; McCardle v. McGinley, 86 Ind. 538, 44 Am. Rep. 348; McPherson v. Runyon (Minn.) 40 Alb. L. J. 408; Smith v. Smith, 20 Hun, 555.

The cases however which sustain this view do not countenance an action when the vexatious suit has not been actually instituted and prosecuted to such effect that the plaintiff has sustained pecuniary loss.

Inasmuch as the defamatory words, which must be set forth in an action for slander or libel, are not alleged in the present complaint, the case cannot be treated as an action for slander or libel.

The motion for a new trial is denied.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

George A. CASE, Respt.,

v.

SUN INSURANCE CO., Appt.

(....Cal....)

The time for bringing suit on an insurance policy which provides that no suit or action shall be commenced unless within twelve months next after the fire, and also provides that a claim on the policy shall be due and payable sixty days after full completion by the assured of certain requirements of the policy, does not elapse with the expiration of the twelve months after the fire, where a cause of action has not then accrued by completion of such requirements, if the company has insisted on, and the insured has complied with, them as rapidly as he was able.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for the City and County of San Francisco in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, in an action to recover the amount alleged to NOTE.—Fire insurance; limitation of action on policy.

A condition in a policy of insurance, that an action cannot be maintained upon the policy unless commenced within twelve months after the loss, is valid. Riddlebarger v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 386 (19 L. ed. 257); Gilio v. Western Assur. Co. 65 Miss. 532.

The condition is not fulfilled by a previous action commenced within that period, which was dismissed. Riddlebarger v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. supra.

The statute of a State which allows a party who suffers a nonsuit in an action to bring a new action for the same cause within one year afterwards does not affect the rights of the parties in such case. Ibid.

The disability to sue imposed by the war relieves the assured wholly from the consequences of failing to bring suit within twelve months after the loss, as required by his policy. Semmes v. City F. Ins. Co. 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 158 (20 L. ed. 490).

Where a policy provides that no action shall be commenced after a year, and that lapse of time shall be taken as conclusive evidence against the validity of the claim, any statute of limitation to the contrary notwithstanding, the statute relative to the bringing of a second action within a year to be due under a policy of fire insurance. Assured.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Maura Haggis, Van Ness & Dibble,
for respondent:

Until full compliance with the provision of the policy, and the expiration of sixty days thereafter, right of action upon the policy did not accrue.

May, Ins. § 470; Doyle v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 44
Cal. 364.

The limitation clause does not apply in those cases in which, without fault on the part of the assured, and by reason of the acts of the Company, the right of action does not accrue within a year subsequent to the fire.

F. Ins. Co.* 37 N. Y. 188; May, Ins. §§ 486, 487.

Sharpstain, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The policy upon which this action is based contains, among others, the following clause.
"It is mutually agreed that no suit or action for the recovery of any claim by virtue of this policy shall be sustainable in any court of law or chancery until appraisal shall be had, if demanded by this Company, and in accordance with the printed conditions of this policy, nor unless such suit or action shall be commenced within twelve months next after the fire shall occur." The fire is alleged to have occurred on the 12th day of September, 1884; and this action was commenced on the 23d day of November, 1885, more than twelve months next after the fire occurred.

The contention of appellant is that at the time of the commencement of the action it was barred by the terms of said stipulation. That contention must prevail unless the clause upon which it is based is modified by some other clause or clauses of the policy. One clause reads as follows: "The amount of loss or damage to be estimated according to the actual, cash, marketable value of the property at the time of the loss, which in no case shall exceed what it would then cost to replace the same, deducting therefrom a suitable amount for any depreciation of such property by reason of age, wear and tear, location, change of style, lack of adaptation to profitable use or other causes.

The adjusted claim under this policy shall be due and payable at the company's office in San Francisco, Cal., sixty days after the full completion by the assured of all the requirements herein contained."

Among the requirements therein contained were the following: "The assured, his, her and their agents and servants, shall, whenever required, submit to an examination or examinations, under oath, by any person appointed by this Company, and subscribe to such examinations when reduced to writing, and shall also produce their books of account and other vouchers, and exhibit the same for examination at the office of this Company in San Francisco as often as required, and permit extracts and copies thereof to be made. The assured also shall produce certified copies of all bills and invoices the originals of which have been lost, and shall exhibit all that remains of the said property, damaged or not damaged, for examination, to any person or persons named by this Company, and shall also furnish such further particulars, and such certificates of a magistrate or officer charged with the duty of investigating fires, as may be required. The proofs of loss shall be made by the party insured in regular form."

It is alleged and proven that appellant exacted a compliance by the assured with all of these requirements, and that the insured complied therewith as rapidly as he was able to,
and that he was unable to fully comply therewith before the 16th day of October, 1885,— more than thirteen months after the fire occurred, and more than one month after the expiration of the time within which an action could be commenced, according to the construction which the appellant's counsel insist should be given to the policy. The adjusted claim under the policy was payable sixty days after the full completion of the assured of all the requirements contained in the policy. No right of action accrued until more than three months after it was barred by the twelve-months' limitation clause, unless that clause is modified by some other clause.

In Spare v. Home Mut. Ins. Co., 0 Sawyer, 142, 17 Fed. Rep. 568, the court, Dundy, J., said: "On the authority of adjudged cases (*Davidson v.
Phoenix Ins. Co.* 4 Sawyer, 594, *Riddleberger v.
Hartford Ins. Co.* 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 269 [19 L. ed.
250] May, Ins. § 478). It is admitted by counsel for the plaintiff that this clause in the policy limiting the time within which a suit may be commenced thereon against the defendant is valid, but they contend that it must be read in connection with that other clause which provides after a reversal of the first is inapplicable. Hooker v. Howard Ins. Co. 130 Pa. 170.

Under the Iowa Statute, which provides that no action on a policy of insurance shall be brought within ninety days after notice of loss, anything in the policy or contract to the contrary notwithstanding, any provision in the policy is controlled by the Statute, and receiving proofs of loss and admitting that the policy is void cannot be regarded as a waiver of the provisions of the Statute. *Vore
v. Hawkeye Ins. Co.* 76 Iowa, 542.

The limitation clause in a policy, followed by a clause exempting a waiver of any conditions unless expressed in writing signed by the president or secretary of the company, are waived by a course of conduct of the company which induces insured to believe that the loss would be adjusted and paid without suit. Dwelling-House Ins. Co. v. Brodie (Ark.) 4 L. R. A. 464, and cases cited on p. 468.

A condition, in a policy of life insurance, that suit shall be brought within six months from date of death, does not apply where the superintendent of the defendant company, before expiration of the time to sue, has promised to pay the money. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. v. Dampney (Md.) April 18,

that a loss does not become payable until sixty days after the proof of that fact is made; and that, taken together, the reasonable construction of them is that, the right to sue on the policy being postponed until the loss is payable, namely, sixty days after proof thereof, the twelve-months' limitation upon such right does not commence to run until that time. This construction is supported by the decided weight of authority and in my judgment is correct on principle. New York v. Hamilton F. Ins. Co. 89 N. Y. 45; Hay v. Star F. Ins. Co. 77 N. Y. 241; Barber v. Wheeling F. & M. Ins. Co. 16 W. Va. 658; Chandler v. St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co. 21 Minn. 85; Steen v. Niagara F. Ins. Co. 89 N. Y. 315; Killips v. Putnam F. Ins. Co. 28 Wis. 472; May, Ins. § 479.

"In Steen v. Niagara F. Ins. Co., 89 N. Y. 323, the policy contained two similar conditions; and the court, in construing them, said: 'We think the intention of the defendant was to give the insured a full period of twelve months, within any part of which he might commence his action; and having, by postponement of the time of payment, secured itself from suit, it did not intend to embrace that period within the term after the expiration of which it could not be sued. In other words, the parties cannot be presumed to have suspended the remedy and provided for the running of the period of limitation during the same time. Indeed, the actual case is stronger; not only was the remedy postponed, but the liability even did not exist at the time of the fire, nor until it was fixed and ascertained according to the provisions of the policy. Having thus made the doing of certain things, and a fixed lapse of time thereafter, conditions precedent to the bringing of an action, the parties must be deemed to have contracted in reference to a time when the insured, except for that contract, might be in a condition to bring an action. Under any other construction the two conditions are inconsistent with each other.'"

This case is distinguishable from Garido v. Am. Cent. Ins. Co. (Cal.), 8 Pac. Rep. 512, in which the plaintiff had ample time after his right of action accrued to have commenced it within twelve months after the loss occurred. In this case it was more than twelve months after the fire before an action could be commenced. We must concede, however, that Garido v. Am. Cent. Ins. Co., supra, is not altogether in harmony with the cases which we follow in this case. Under the construction which we give to the policy, we think the complaint states a cause of action not barred by the provisions of the policy; and the evidence is sufficient to justify the verdict of the jury.

Judgment and order affirmed.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

Susan B. WILLARD

v.

Andrew J. FINNEGAN.

(....Minn....)

*1. A sale, under a power in a mortgage, in gross as one parcel, of several separate and distinct tracts of land, is not void, but only voidable, for good cause shown, as that it was the result of fraud, or that prejudice resulted to the mortgagor or owner of the equity of redemption.

Head notes by MITCHELL, J.

NOTE.—Power of sale in mortgage.

A power of sale coupled with an interest cannot be revoked by a mortgagor, and his death cannot defeat or suspend the right to execute the power. Hudrins v. Morrow, 47 Ark. 515; Way v. Mullett, 8 New Eng. Rep. 200, 143 Mass. 49.

The provision of the Montana statutes, that "a mortgage of real property shall not be deemed a conveyance, whatever its terms, so as to enable an owner of the mortgage to recover possession of the real property without foreclosure and sale," does not prevent giving to the mortgagee a power to sell the premises upon default. First Nat. Bank v. Bell Silver & Copper Min. Co. 8 Mont. 82.

It does not follow from the possession of a power of sale by the grantee in a deed absolute on its face, but in fact a mere security, that the power is to be exercised otherwise than by foreclosure. Pearson v. Sharp, 7 Cent. Rep. 494, 115 Pa. 254.

A power of sale in a mortgage or deed of trust may be so limited that a sale under the power cannot be made, and yet there may be a remedy by foreclosure. Davis v. Bessahl, 4 West. Rep. 61, 88 Mo. 420.

The sale of premises under such power will operate as a foreclosure. Way v. Mullett, 8 New Eng. Rep. 200, 143 Mass. 49.

Such sale cuts off the equity of redemption as effectually as a sale under a decree of foreclosure, leaving in the mortgagor nothing but a statutory right of redemption. Gessenheimer v. Molton, 80 Ala. 621.

2. A. executed a mortgage to M., and subsequently conveyed to W. M. foreclosed his mortgage, and purchased the property at the sale. Neither A. nor W. redeemed from the sale, but a redemption was made by F., as a judgment creditor of A., who obtained a certificate of redemption. But before F. redeemed A. duly tendered him the amount due on his judgment, which he refused to accept. Held, that, as being void, if a material condition precedent to the exercise of the power does not exist. Hence a purchaser from a trustee under a deed of trust made to secure the payment of certain notes which had been previously paid, and the deed of trust having by its terms thereby become void, takes no title. Temple v. Whittier, 5 West. Rep. 144, 117 Ill. 283.

A purchaser purchases at the peril of the sale being void, if a material condition precedent to the exercise of the power does not exist. Hence a purchaser from a trustee under a deed of trust made to secure the payment of certain notes which had been previously paid, and the deed of trust having by its terms thereby become void, takes no title. Temple v. Whittier, 5 West. Rep. 144, 117 Ill. 283.

A mortgagee who becomes the purchaser at his own sale thereby arms the mortgagor with the option, if seasonably expressed, to disaffirm the sale.

A mortgagee who becomes the purchaser at his own sale thereby arms the mortgagor with the option, if seasonably expressed, to disaffirm the sale.

A mortgagee who becomes the purchaser at his own sale thereby arms the mortgagor with the option, if seasonably expressed, to disaffirm the sale.

tees F. and W. (who had no interest in the property), the redemption was valid; that M., the purchaser at the mortgage sale, alone could raise the question whether the tender discharged the lien of F's judgment, so as to terminate his right to redeem.

(February 7, 1883.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Hennepin County dismissing the complaint, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, in an action brought to determine an adverse claim made by defendant to certain real estate to which plaintiff claimed title. Affirmed.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Hennepin County determining that he had no right to redeem certain real estate from a mortgage sale thereof, and that he had no valid title thereto. Reversed. The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Mr. L. B. Stetler, for plaintiff:

The sale of the land under the mortgage as an entire tract was unauthorized and absolutely void and the sheriff's certificate of sale void on its face, and Michael Maloney acquired no title to the premises by reason thereof.

Full v. King, 88 Minn. 349.

Mr. A. D. Smith, for defendant:

A mere tender, even if kept good, will not extinguish or pay the debt itself. It merely stops costs; it does not even suspend the remedy against the debtor, or any remedy or legal right which the creditor may have as appurtenant to the debt in the form in which it may happen. A fortiori a tender does not discharge a judgment.

Jackson v. Law, 5 Cow. 348; Law v. Jackson, 9 Cow. 841; People v. Beads, 1 Barb. 379.

The foreclosure of the property in dispute was regular and legal, and passed the title to Michael Maloney, subject to the right of redemption.

Bettinson v. Atlas L. Ins. Co. 81 Minn. 125—without regard to its fairness or adequacy of price; and when the sale is set aside, the decree relates back to the sale, and the parties are in the same position as if no sale had been made. Gegenheimer v. Motion, 80 Ala. 321.

Where a third party purchases for the benefit of the mortgagee, the sale is not absolutely void, but voidable only. Nichols v. Otto (Ill.) Jan. 22, 1880.

Requisites to validity of sale.

A sale under a power contained in a mortgage may be set aside for insufficient notice. Dickerson v. Small, 1 Cent. Rep. 497, 84 Md. 300.

A foreclosure sale under a power in the mortgage is not invalidated by the omission of the names of the mortgagor and mortgagee in the advertisement of sale. Ogan v. McNamara, 15 Ill. L.—, Index 21, 22.

An advertisement of a sale under a power contained in a mortgage which required publication of notice in some newspaper in the County of Providence, Rhode Island, was not insufficient because it appeared in a newspaper published at a place in the county other than one of two certain places in which the record of the mortgage erroneously required notice to be published. Ibid.

The non-observance of a custom among auctioneers to place notices upon doors or windows of houses for sale, stating the time and place of sale, is not sufficient to set aside a sale made under a power in a mortgage. Chilton v. Brooks, 68 Md. 354.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action to determine an adverse claim of defendant to real property of which plaintiff alleges she is the owner. The defendant denies plaintiff's title, alleges that he is the owner, and asks that it be so adjudged. Plaintiff's title depends upon the validity of a sale, under a power, on a mortgage executed by her grantor, one Abbott, to the Maloneys. Defendant's title depends upon a redemption by him, as a judgment creditor of Abbott, from the sale on the Maloney mortgage. The facts are that Abbott executed to the Maloneys a mortgage on a piece of land according to government description, then constituting a single tract; but subsequently he platted the land, dividing it into urban lots and blocks, the Maloneys not joining in the plat. Under these facts the Maloneys would doubtless have had the right to sell the entire premises as one tract, as it was described in their mortgage; at least, in the absence of a request that the sale be in separate parcels, by one interested in the property, who had some equitable right to have it sold in that way in order to protect his interests. Johnson v. Williams, 4 Minn. 240 (Gil. 183); Piquin v. Bracey, 10 Minn. 379 (Gil. 304); Abbott v. Pack, 85 Minn. 499.

But where the mortgagor, subsequent to the mortgage, divides the premises into separate tracts, as by platting it into lots and blocks, the mortgagee has the right to adopt this division, and sell the property, as the Maloneys did in this case, as lots and blocks, according to the descriptions in the plat. But, if he does so, properly he should sell the different tracts according to the plat separately; whereas, in the present instance, although described in the notice of sale according to the plat as separate lots and blocks, all were sold together for one gross sum. This, it is claimed, rendered the sale absolutely void. The Statute provides tioners to place notices upon doors or windows of houses for sale, stating the time and place of sale, is not sufficient to set aside a sale made under a power in a mortgage. Chilton v. Brooks, 68 Md. 354.

The provision of the Montana statute for "thirty days' notice" of a sale under a power in a mortgage, by publishing once a week for three weeks successively, does not require that all three publications shall be thirty days before the sale, but only that the first one shall be. First Nat. Bank v. Bell Silver & Copper Min. Co. 3 Mont. 32.

A sale of mortgaged real property under a power is not invalid because the notice of sale does not sufficiently describe certain personal property also covered by the mortgage, especially where such description is as full as that in the mortgage. Ibid.

That the record of a mortgage incorrectly states the place of publication of the notice of sale will not avoid the notice, if the publication is made as provided in the mortgage. Ogan v. McNamara, supra.

A sale of land, under a power in a mortgage, for $1,000 or more below the market value of the property, will be set aside where it was purchased by the mortgagee, and the sale was made on a day when the weather was so inclement as to prevent purchasers from attending. Chilton v. Brooks, supra.

that, "If the mortgaged premises consist of separate and distinct farms or tracts, they shall be sold separately." Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 61, § 8.

Whether a sale, contrary to the Statute, renders it absolutely void, or only voidable where it is made to appear that there was fraud, or that the disregard of the Statute resulted in actual prejudice to the mortgagor or owner of the equity of redemption is a question upon which there is some conflict of authority, at least in the case of non-judicial sales. As early as Tillman v. Jackson, 1 Minn. 188 (Qu. 157), it was held that a similar provision as to sales on execution was only directory, and that a violation of it by the sheriff would not invalidate the sale. This case, having stood apparently unquestioned for twenty three years, was followed and recognized as having become a rule of property in Lumberton v. Merchants Nat. Bank, 24 Minn. 281, in which this court held that a sale on execution in gross, as one parcel, of several distinct and separate tracts of land not lying in a body, is not void, but might be vacated for cause shown, as that it was the result of actual fraud, or that prejudice resulted to the owner from it, or that there was no just ground for making the sale that way. This decision was followed by the United States Circuit Court for the District of Minnesota, and the same rule applied in the case of a mortgage sale under a power. Sutton v. Baiberg, 1 McCrary, 96, 1 Fed. Rep. 444.

If this doctrine had become a rule of property thirteen years ago, it certainly is so yet, never having been, in the mean time, either overruled or questioned. There is no room for any distinction between sales on execution and sales under a power. Neither are judicial sales. A sale by a sheriff on an ordinary execution is a mere ministerial one, made by the officer by the naked authority of the writ and the requirements of the Statute. A sale under a power contained in a mortgage is made by the mortgagee or his agent pursuant to the convention of the parties. Viewed from a practical stand-point, we think the better rule is that a sale contrary to the Statute is merely voidable when fraud, prejudice or other good cause for vacating it is shown. The reasons in its favor given in Cunningham v. Cassidy, 17 N. Y. 578, although used with reference to a judicial sale, are equally applicable to one under a power. The consequences of a contrary rule would be disastrous. A great many titles would be open to question and doubt.

The inquiry whether the land consisted in fact of separate and distinct tracts would often be attended with great difficulty. The question would be one of fact, dependent upon evidence dehors the record, and perhaps often doubtful or conflicting. The validity of titles ought not to be made dependent upon such extraneous facts. Our conclusion is that the mortgage sale was valid, and there having been no redemption from it by either Abbott, the mortgagor, or the plaintiff, his grantee, it follows that the latter has no interest in the property. This disposes of her appeal.

2. Defendant, a judgment creditor of Abbott, duly filed his intention to redeem, and seasonably produced to the sheriff, who made the sale, the proper proof of his right to redeem, paid to such officer the proper amount of money, and received from him a certificate of redemption. The court, however, made what, for present purposes, we may assume was a finding that before defendant made this redemption Abbott made to him a good and legal tender of the amount due on the judgment, which defendant arbitrarily refused to accept. It was on this ground that the learned judge decided adversely to the defendant, holding that this tender operated as a payment of the judgment, or at least as a discharge of its lien, so that he could not afterwards "use it for redemption purposes." Whether, as between defendant and Maloney, the purchaser at the mortgage sale, this proposition is correct or not we need not inquire. It is a question that plaintiff is in no position to raise. Maloney alone can raise it, as he alone is interested in it. Defendant has made a redemption in fact which is good on its face. At most, it is merely voidable, at the election of Maloney, on account of the existence of an extrinsic fact. The redemption is good as against the plaintiff, who has no interest in the property. Maloney is not a party to this action, and consequently his interests cannot be adjudicated or in any way affected. A judgment in this case, adjudging that defendant is the owner of the property, will only determine that he is such as between him and the plaintiff, and to such a judgment he is entitled upon the facts found. Upon his appeal, therefore, the order of the trial judge is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to render judgment in his favor as prayed for in his answer.

Affirmed on plaintiff's appeal, and reversed on defendant's appeal.

*A party who built a dam, causing the back water to fill a ravine across which ran a public highway, made a causeway composed of logs, brush, stone and earth at the place where the public highway ran across the ravine, and made a better way than existed before the construction of the dam. The public used it, and it was for a time maintained and repaired by the overseer of highways of the road district. Held, that the owner of the dam was not chargeable with its maintenance and repair, and was not liable for the value of mules whose death was occasioned by the causeway being out of repair.

(April 4, 1883)

ERROR to the District Court for Norton County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover damages for the loss of certain mules which was alleged to have resulted from the obstruction by defendants of a public highway. Reversed.

Commissioner's opinion.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. L. H. Thompson and O. D. Jones, for plaintiffs in error:

Although Wallace built the dam in question and caused the water to back up into a natural ravine crossing the highway, yet if he left the highway in as good condition as he found it, he had performed all that law or justice required of him.

Venard v. Cross, 8 Kan. 260; State v. Cumberford, 16 Kan. 507; State v. Raypholts, 23 Kan. 454; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Long, 27 Kan. 684.

The embankment built across the ravine was a bridge as defined by 1 Bouvier's Law Dictionary, p. 232.

By the common law counties are chargeable with the repair of all public bridges unless they can show that other persons are bound to repair particular bridges.

1 Walt, Act. and Def. § 8, p. 731.

The corporation, for whose exclusive benefit a bridge is made over a highway, must keep it in repair, and is liable for injuries caused to third persons in consequence of its being out of repair.

Dyert v. Schenck, 23 Wend. 446; Hancock v. Sherman, 14 Wend. 53; Perley v. Chandler, 8 Mass. 451.

A bridge, though erected by individuals, yet if dedicated to the public, used by the public and found to be of public utility, must be repaired by the public.

State v. Campton, 2 N. H. 513; Regus v. Rochester, 45 N. Y. 129, 6 Am. Rep. 53.

Mr. John R. Hamilton, for defendant in error:

Where the owner of land over which a public highway passes digs a raceway across the road and builds a bridge across the same, and an injury is sustained by anyone in consequence thereof, such owner is liable to any person so injured for damages.

4 Bl. Com. p. 6; Dyert v. Schenck, 23 Wend. 443.

Such bridge must be kept in repair by him who built it.

Hancock v. Sherman, 14 Wend. 53.

This is not a case where the bridge or crossing was voluntarily built. They created the necessity for such crossing, which makes a different rule applicable. They created and maintained a nuisance by obstructing a highway, and are liable for any damages as a result thereof.

Gen. Stat. chap. 89, § 17; 2 Dillon, Mun. Corp. 3d ed. §§ 710, 1062-1065, 1060.

Plaintiffs in error were the creators and maintainers of the nuisance, and they could not shift the liability for any damage which might occur by reason thereof upon the public, who cannot be made liable.

Rickerberry v. Banner Twp., 23 Kan. 556; West Bend v. Mann, 59 Wis. 60.

Simpson, O., delivered the following opinion:

recover the sum of $400, the alleged value of a pair of mules, and $200 as exemplary damages. He alleged that in August, 1883, Wallace constructed a dam across a creek that caused the water to fill up a ravine across which ran a public highway that had been located, opened and traveled long before the construction of the dam; that the water had flowed into the ravine until, at the time complained of, it was ten feet deep, and was a hazardous and dangerous obstruction to travel on said highway; that Wallace had sold said dam to Railsback, who, at the time the injury occurred, owned and maintained said dam; that on the 9th day of September, 1885, the plaintiff, with his team of mules, was traveling on said highway with no knowledge of the dangerous condition thereof at the place it crossed the ravine, and that in attempting to cross said ravine his two mules were drowned in the water flowing into said ravine by reason of the construction of said dam. The defendants demurred to the petition, and their demurrer was overruled. They then answered, alleging, among other things, that, at the time the dam was built they caused a safe and suitable embankment to be made of brush, earth and other material across said ravine, on the line of said highway, thereby making a safe and suitable crossing; that this crossing was turned over to the road district, and accepted by it, and these defendants were released from any further liability, or any obligation to keep up and maintain said crossing. They also plead contributory negligence. Cause tried at April Term, 1887, to the court, who rendered a judgment for $400, a motion for a new trial being overruled. Wallace and Railsback bring the case here. They claim that the trial court erred in overruling their demurrer to the petition and evidence; that the right of action is barred by the Statute of Limitations, as the dam was constructed under § 14, chap. 66, Comp. Laws 1885; that there was a misjoinder of parties defendant; that there was an obligation resting on the road district to maintain the crossing and keep it in repair; that the evidence shows contributory negligence.

1. The petition in this case alleges that the place at which the loss occurred to the plaintiff below was a public highway, and alleges an obstruction thereof that was the cause of the loss of the mules. The erection of a dam caused the water to fill up a ravine across which the public highway ran. The man who built the dam constructed across the ravine an embankment of stone, logs, brush and earth, that made a good, safe and reliable crossing as long as it was maintained in the condition in which it was constructed. It was shown at the trial that the road overseer had caused work to be done thereon, and that for some years it was constantly used and reasonably safe. Wallace, one of the plaintiffs in error, built the dam and the embankment, and after owning the mill property, including the dam, for about one year, sold and conveyed it to one Page, who subsequently sold it to Railsback, the other plaintiff in error, who owned the dam at the time of the loss of the mules. On this state of facts it must be apparent that no liability can possibly attach to

Wallace for the loss. Putting this question in the strongest possible attitude for the defendant is error, and assuming for that purpose that the erection of the dam and the back water in the ravine was a continuing nuisance, yet still Rallsback and not Wallace is responsible for the damages occasioned by it. When Wallace sold the dam, and someone else purchased it and assumed all liability, there seems to be no point of view in which Wallace could be held longer responsible. The judgment against him is wrong.

2. To constitute an obstruction to a public highway, it must appear that the public travel by reason thereof is actually hindered and endangered. No private action can be maintained if the obstruction continues and becomes a common nuisance on account of the nuisance per se; but if any individual suffers a more special injury than any other, from the continuance of such a nuisance, he has his action therefor. All this is alphabetical law, and affords a sure basis upon which the argument in the case must rest. The controlling question in this case is, Who is responsible for the care and repair of the highway at the point where it crosses the ravine? It is as much a part of the highway as any other portion of its length or breadth. The people at large have the right to the free and uninterrupted use of it, not upon the sufferance of the man who built the embankment, but as a matter of right. It has been held that, if a man builds a bridge that is useful to the public in general, it is the duty of the public authorities to repair it, notwithstanding it may be of benefit to the builder. Rat v. West Riding of Yorkshire, 3 Burr 2504; Hiscock v. Sherman, 14 Wend. 58; Regua v. Rochester, 48 N. Y. 120; Thompson, Highw. 3d ed. 12.

If a bridge is erected over a natural stream by a man for his own benefit, and it is of public utility, and is used by the public, the public is bound to keep it in repair, for in such case, although the bridge is of advantage to the man who built it, he did not create the necessity for it. Dyert v. Schenck, 20 Wend 446.

Where a person erected a mill and dam for his own profit, and by so doing deepened the water of a ford, through which there was a public highway, but the passage through which, before the deepening, was very inconvenient, and the miller built a bridge over it, and the public used it, and the miller had repaired it, the court held that the county, and not the miller, was chargeable with the repair. Rat v. Kent Co 2 Maule & S. 510.

All public bridges are prima facie repairable by the public. Most, if not all, of the earlier cases that have any bearing on this question make this distinction: If the bridge is built by a private person, and it is manifestly to the interest of the public to use it, and they do use it, and the way is better than it was before the bridge was built, the public are chargeable with its repair; but, if the improved way is not better than it was before, the public receives no benefit. This is certainly a very liberal interpretation of the law, so far as the public are concerned. If the principle of these cases is applied to the facts developed on the trial of this case, there can be no recovery against Rallsback, as the duty to keep the crossing in repair is devolved upon the road district. Our statutory enactment, requiring railroad corporations to restore to its former condition any public highway it may cross in the course of its construction, seems to have this principle in view. This court, construing this provision, holds that when a railroad company restores the crossing of a public highway to the condition that existed at the time of the construction of its line across the highway, the railroad company is under no obligation thereafter, under this provision, to maintain it in a safe and sufficient state of repair. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Long, 27 Kan. 684.

It can be said that it is the Statute that relieves the railroad company from the liability to maintain the highway after it has been restored to its former condition, and that there is no statute that operates in favor of the defendants in error. While it is true that the courts in this country have almost universally refused to hold the public to a common law liability to repair public highways, the statutes of every State establish their liability, and this is so universal that prima facie they must be chargeable therewith, but the question in this case is, Has not the public, by its acceptance and use of this road-way, and by its control and repair, assumed the liability? It cannot be successfully contended that this particular fill or causeway across the ravine is not a part of the public highway. The public has the absolute control of it. The man who built it has no right to obstruct it. If he lives in that road district, he can be compelled to contribute money or labor to its maintenance and repair. The moment he finished its construction it became a part of the public highway, and his control ceased for every purpose. It then necessarily became the statutory duty of the road district to keep it in repair. The record discloses that at the place where these plaintiffs in error filled the ravine they made a better and safer road-way than existed before. It is shown that it was used for some years by the public. There is some evidence tending to show that the road overseer of the district caused work to be done on it, and at times repaired it. It is not shown that it was located on the land, or that it was erected for the personal benefit of either of the plaintiffs in error. This case was tried and decided upon the theory that both Wallace and Rallsback were chargeable with the maintenance and repair of a public highway, and this was error. We recommend that the judgment be reversed, and a new trial granted.

It is so ordered.

FLORIDA SUPREME COURT.

L. B. SKINNER et al., Appls.,

W. D. HENDERSON et al., Commissioners of Hillsborough County.

*1. Under the Constitution and laws of this State a county cannot impose taxes except for county purposes, and the building of a bridge in a county within the corporate limits of a municipality in which the county outside of those limits is in nowise interested, the same being for the sole benefit and advantage of the municipality, is not a county purpose.

2. Where an injunction is sought against a county to prevent the appropriation of its revenues to aid in the building of a bridge in a city, and the allegations of the bill are that the bridge is on a city street, and not a county road or highway, and that the county outside of the city is nowise interested in it, and that it is for the sole benefit and advantage of the city, it was error to sustain a demurrer to the bill.

3. But the Statute authorizing the city to build bridges within its limits does not necessarily revoke the authority given to the county by General Statute, without restriction as to locality, to build a bridge within those limits. As there may be bridges serving only a city purpose, so there may be others demanded in the same territory for county purposes; and where the circumstances create this demand, and the bridge is for the use and benefit of the people of the county at large or of some considerable portion of them, and intended and needed as well for those outside as for those inside the city, the authority of the county to build it is not annulled by the local city statute.

4. The circumstances of each case must determine the line of authority, even where there is assent of the municipal government; but in case of conflict between municipal and county officials, it would seem that the county should give way, in deference to the general policy against one jurisdiction clashing with another.

5. If a county may build a bridge within the limits of a municipality when the circumstances suit, it may also aid the municipality in building one under like circumstances, even though it is to be constructed under a contract with the municipality, and is to be under its control.

(May, 1890.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a decree of the Circuit Court for Hillsborough County dismissing the bill in a suit brought to enjoin defendants from applying county revenues towards the building of a bridge within the City of Tampa. Reversed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. William Hunter for appellants.

Messrs. Sparkman & Sparkman for appellees.

Maxwell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The City of Tampa, in Hillsborough County.

made a contract with a certain bridge company for the construction of a bridge within the corporate limits of the city across Hillsborough River. The cost of construction was to be $18,800. Upon petition to the County Commissioners of the County by the citizens of Tampa, and application in behalf of the city by the president of its council, said Commissioners ordered an appropriation of $4,800 towards the construction of the bridge, to be paid by the County, this amount being one third of the contract price for its construction, and contributed on the understanding that it should be a free bridge. Thereupon appellants filed a bill against the County Commissioners (appellees), praying that they be enjoined from paying out said amount for the construction of the bridge.

Besides the foregoing facts stated in the bill, it alleges, among other things immaterial here, that complainants are citizens and taxpayers of the County of Hillsborough; that the Commissioners levied a tax for the year 1887 for general revenue purposes, which will produce a large surplus, and that they did this for the purpose and with the intent of assisting the City of Tampa "to build a bridge across Hillsborough River on Lafayette Street, which is a city street, and not a county road or highway," and said bridge "is to be entirely and exclusively under the jurisdiction and control" of said city; that the County "outside of said City of Tampa, is in nowise interested in the building of said bridge, and that the same is for the sole benefit and advantage of said city;" that the County "receives no consideration" for said appropriation; that "said bridge, being wholly within the corporate limits of said city, is entirely a municipal improvement, and the expense thereof should be defrayed entirely by said city; that the revenues collected from your orators by county taxation are not levied for the purpose of making such improvements in . . . Tampa, or any other municipality, and cannot be legally expended for such purposes, as the building of said bridge in said city is not a "county purpose" within the meaning of the Constitution.

The defendant demurred to the bill for want of equity, and the demurrer was in effect sustained, though the ruling and order thereon were irregular—the order being "that the injunction be denied and the bill dismissed." Then appellants entered an appeal, but no point has been made here on this irregularity.

It is contended by appellants that the money proposed to be expended by the Commissioners to aid in the building of the bridge is not for a "county purpose," and that they have no authority to appropriate money raised by taxation for the County to any other purpose. As to their authority this is clearly correct. The Constitution (§ 5, art. 9) provides that the "Legislature shall authorize the several counties and incorporated cities or towns in the State to assess and impose taxes for county and municipal purposes, and for no other purposes." What is a county purpose, as distinguished from a municipal purpose, is a question arising here from the fact that the City of Tampa is a part of the County of Hillsborough, and from the further fact that the County is authorized by statute to build bridges in the County without restriction as to locality, and that the city is authorized by its charter to build bridges within its corporate limits—both having authority for the same purpose there, if that given to the city does not exclude its territory from the domain within the jurisdiction of the County for such purpose. Confusing ourselves to the allegations of the bill, it appears that the building of the bridge is wholly a matter belonging to the City of Tampa. The contract for building was its contract. The highway on opposite sides of the river, to be connected by the bridge, is alleged to be a city street, and not a county highway, and it is further alleged that the County outside of the city is in no wise interested in the building of the bridge, and that the bridge is for the sole benefit and advantage of the city, being wholly within its corporate limits, and entirely a municipal improvement. These facts, taken as true under the demurrer, show that the expenditure on the bridge would be for a city, and not a county, "purpose." They do not present the question, whether the County can build, or aid in building, a bridge in the city under any circumstances; or, in other words, whether the jurisdiction of the city entirely excludes the county from its territory for such work. If the Constitution will permit requirements of the county in its highways and in the interest and convenience of all its citizens to affect this question, so as to allow concurrent authority where the work will serve both a county and city purpose, that cannot determine the case here in its present shape. As there may be bridges in a city altogether for local convenience, for aught that appears before us the one in question may be of that class. The bill avers that it is. We know judicially that Tampa is the county seat of Hillsborough, and that outside of Tampa there is habitable territory on both sides of Hillsborough River, but these relations of the County to the city do not of themselves authorize the former to enter the latter for any work that answers only a city purpose, such as the bill alleges of this bridge. If allowed to enter at all, it must be for work that answers a county purpose—that is, work for the use and benefit of the people of the County at large, or of some considerable portion of them, and intended and needed as well for those outside as for those inside the city. The bill does not show that the bridge is a work of this kind, but on the contrary shows only such facts as bespeak a work for merely city use and benefit. We think the County Commissioners are not authorized to aid in such a work, and that their demurrer to the bill should have been overruled.

While this conclusion decides the case upon the present record, we find in the argument of appellant's counsel, and in that of counsel for appellees, a full discussion of the question, whether the legislative grant of authority to the City of Tampa to build bridges within its corporate limits does not intercept the general authority for that purpose given to the county, so far as the territory of the city is concerned—the counsel for appellants insisting that it does, and the counsel for appellees that it does not. Anticipating that in the further progress of the case below, this question may be more pertinently presented, our views on it now will not be out of place.

The theory of appellants is that the officials empowered to act in the management of county affairs have no authority to expend money they raise by taxation for county purposes in building bridges within the corporate limits of any municipality in the County. Whether they have or not is the question to be solved. It is admitted for appellants that if the County has the right to build the bridge, it would likewise have right to appropriate for a part of the expense, but insisted that if it could not pay in whole, it could not pay in part. Then, the problem is, Can the county officials under their general authority, and notwithstanding the special authority of the city, go into the city to build a bridge, or to act in conjunction with the city for that purpose? The rulings on this question are diverse, but they all agree that it depends on constitutional provision or legislative enactment applicable in the particular case, with general principles of law to interpret or construe them. We have mentioned all there is in the Constitution and laws of this State on the subject. Counties cannot expend money except for county purposes, and where a county and municipality cover the same ground, there is nothing which expressly directs what each may do respectively in the line of its authority. The nearest approach to any decision on the question in this State is in the case of State v. Putnam Co., 23 Fla. 632, where it was held that the establishment of a municipality on territory over which passes part of a public road established by the road authorities of the county, does not of itself abolish the road as a public highway, nor revoke or suspend the powers and duties of those authorities in regard to it. The court was careful to go no further. But in this decision it appears that a county may, under some circumstances, have powers and duties touching highways in a city or town, for the proper exercise and enforcement of which it can be held responsible, and the same would be true of a bridge similarly situated.

There may be distinctively municipal purposes in respect to bridges within a corporation, as where a small stream, purely local, and having no connection with county highways, should be bridged for the convenience of citizens of the corporation; and it is conceivable that there may also be county purposes in the same respect therein, as where the bridge connects public highways of the county, and is of use and importance to the citizens of the county, irrespective of residence in the corporation, and especially if the court-house of the county is in the corporation. It would seem but just and reasonable in such case that the county should take or share the burden of furnishing to the public the convenience of the bridge. In this connection it is worthy of observation that all the taxpayers of the county, those in municipalities not excepted, are required to contribute to the revenue of the county for bridge purposes, without reference to residence. If residing in a municipality they must pay a bridge tax for any and every locality inside or outside thereof, if in the county; while if not residing in a municipality, if appellants' view is correct, they cannot be taxed for a bridge therein, though for a county purpose. It should not be assumed, and in the absence of assumption there is no reason to hold, that such inequality of tax burden was intended to be imposed. This involves relieving the county from the burden when a county purpose is to be subserved in a municipality, but holding the municipality liable for both county and municipal burden, whether in or out of the corporate limits. The palpable injustice of this is most striking. It is nothing more nor less than imposing a double burden upon municipal citizens, one of which is a burden for a county purpose within the municipality, and exempting other citizens of the county from any burden for such purpose, although interested in common in the object to be attained.

We hence conclude that the special authority given to any municipality to build bridges within its limits does not necessarily supersede the general authority given to the county. But as there may be a municipal purpose in which the county has no concern, and a county purpose in which all are alike, though perhaps not equally interested, the circumstances of each case must determine the question of authority. And it seems to us that this would be so even where there is assent of the municipal government. Whether that authority should be exercised in the event of conflict between the two bodies is not involved in this case, as the city and county are in accord in the building of the bridge. In cases where such conflict would arise, we are inclined to the opinion that the County should give way, in deference to the general policy against one jurisdiction clashing with another.

As we have said, the authorities differ on the main question under discussion. But much of this difference grows out of the difference in statutes that govern. We will not undertake a review of the cases, but content ourselves with citing those which sustain the views we have expressed. In Ohio it is held that if there is nothing in the Act incorporating a town which limits the power of the county commissioners to establish a county road through or within its corporate limits, that power still exists. Wells v. McLaughlin, 17 Ohio, 90, Butman v. Fowler, Id. 101. In Connecticut (Norwich v. Story, 25 Conn. 44), it is held that the charter of a city conferring power on its common council to lay out new highways, etc., did not divert the county court of the jurisdiction given by statute for the same purpose. A similar ruling in Iowa is valuable as coming from Judge Dillon, one of the most eminent of American jurists and law authors now living, and valuable also as having been announced in an opinion which fully discusses the subject—Dell v. Ketch, 31 Iowa, 119. See also Murrett v. Brooks, Id. 144.

There is this difference, however, between our statutes and the statutes of Iowa: that while the authority to the counties to build bridges is the same, our statute gives authority to the City of Tampa to establish and regulate bridges within its limits, while that in Iowa (General Act) gives to cities and towns "care, supervision and control of all public . . . bridges . . . within the city, and shall cause the same to be kept open and in repair," etc. But the reasoning on which it is held that the counties are not divested of authority to build bridges in cities is equally applicable to both, with proper modification, giving due weight here to the authority of counties to act for "county purposes." We think the doctrine of these cases is to be preferred under the system established by our Constitution and statutes.

The cases cited for appellants, and maintaining the position that county revenues cannot be expended under a contract to which the county is not a party, do not seem to us to have the force attributed to them here. Colton v. Hanchett, 18 Ill. 515, simply decides that where legislative authority is given to an individual to build a toll bridge, the county officials cannot appropriate county funds to aid in its construction, because no law of the State authorizes such appropriation. If the view on which we rest our opinion, that in this State a county may build a bridge in a municipality to meet a county purpose, is correct, there is law here to authorize county appropriation of money therefor, and the authority is none the less existent because the appropriation is in aid of a municipal contract to build the bridge, if a county purpose is thereby advanced. Why should not a county expend money to aid in building a bridge, when it has authority to pay the whole expense of building it. If there is anything in the Colton Hanchett Case that seems to make a distinction, it goes beyond the controversy there, for it was a case where the authority to build the bridge was not in the county officials, and of course, therefore, they could not aid therein. The other case (Atty-Gen. v. Bay Co. 34 Mich. 46), was one where county supervisors undertook to appropriate money for township roads, leaving to the townships to say to what roads it should be applied. It was held this could not be done, partly because the county board had no occasion to raise money for other than its own roads, and partly because there was no definition of purposes, as the expenditure was to be under the direction of the town officer. As to the first ground, that is fully met in this case, if the bridge answers a county purpose, and, as to the second, there is no indefiniteness of purpose to which the money is to be applied. But the court says in the case that "taxes and loans, when authorized to be raised by any public body, must be raised under the implied condition that they are to be applied to the public uses under the control or care of that body. They cannot be raised for the purposes or uses of others, unless such a power is plainly given." It will be seen, upon scrutinizing the case, that this and other similar language of the opinion applied to the action of county supervisors in respect to roads under the supervision of township supervisors, when by the statute their action was limited to "state and territorial roads."

The distinction between that case and the present is obvious. As in that it was held that county revenues could not be used for township roads, so in this we hold that county revenues cannot be used for city bridges as such, but in that the money was being applied to roads not "state and territorial," and not embraced within any authority of the county supervisors; while in this, if the conditions suit, it will be applied to an authorized "county purpose." It does not seem reasonable that in all cases there is such necessary connection between the expenditure of money for public uses and the control ordinarily resulting from such expenditure, as to prevent the expenditure when made for a lawful purpose, because in accomplishing that purpose it is done in a way to relieve from the control that entails further liability.

It is no objection to our conclusion, as applicable to the case at bar, if it can be shown that the bridge answers a county purpose, as distinguished from a local city purpose, that the bridge was to be constructed under a contract with the city, and that the city will have control of the same, and must bear the responsibilities connected with it. This will be that much better for the County. So far as it is said to be objectionable on the ground that the appropriation by the County is towards the payment of a debt of the city, the bridge being built under a contract with the city, that is met by the fact, if found to exist, that the appropriation is for a county purpose, and would be in effect a payment of its own obligation. And so far as it is said to be objectionable on the ground that the ownership and control of the bridge will be in the city, that is met by the admission, connected with our view as to the authority of the County to build the bridge itself if thereby serving a county purpose, that if "the County would have a right to build the bridge, it would likewise have a right to appropriate for a part of it." As to responsibility for proper care and repair of the bridge, we express no opinion. But if the County discharges a duty in the attainment of a county purpose in such manner as to be relieved from further responsibility in the matter, this furnishes no reason against the validity of its action. We are to understand that in making the appropriation the Commissioners acted, not as aiding the city in a work with which they had no concern, but as performing a primary duty of their own under the power vested in them to build bridges in the County. The reservation they made that the bridge would be a free one, was to guard against restrictions in its use which would not be within the scope of their authority, and was a proper consideration for joining in the work.

Under our conclusion it will be for the defendants to determine, upon existing facts of the situation, whether they will further resist the injunction.

The decree is reversed, with leave to them to answer, if they should deem it advisable.

Private roads; way of necessity.

There is a way by necessity, where another cannot be got or made without reasonable labor and expense; and, in determining the question, the jury may consider the comparative value of the land and the probable cost of such way, and that the word "necessary" cannot be limited to absolute physical necessity. But yet the way must be necessary, and the facts of each case must determine whether it or any other easement thus claimed is necessary. It must be more than one of mere convenience, or one beneficial and convenient, and is only commensurate with the existence of the necessity upon which the implied grant of it is founded, and ceases when the necessity for it ceases. Marvin v. Brewster Iron Min. Co. 35 N. Y. 533; Screven v. Gregoria,

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Grant County sustaining a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought to establish a way of necessity over defendant's land. Reversed.

The facts fully appear in the opinion.

Messrs. W. H. Carroll and G. Dean for appellant.

Messrs. H. Brownlee and H. J. Paulus for appellee.

Elliott, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, in her complaint, describes a tract of land of which she is the owner, and alleges that the appellee is also the owner of a parcel of land which she particularly describes. In addition to the allegations referred to the complaint contains the following: That in the year 1878, Enos Key was the owner of both parcels of land; that in January of that year he sold to the plaintiff the land she owns, that he subsequently sold and conveyed to the appellee's grantor the land now owned by the appellee; that both of the parties to this action hold under Enos Key; that the land of the plaintiff is surrounded on all sides by the lands of divers persons, including the land of the appellee; that the plaintiff's land is completely shut off from any highway; that it is impossible to go to the plaintiff's land without passing over adjoining land; that the appellant refuses to permit the plaintiff to pass over his land to a highway, and for the purpose of preventing her from passing over his land has erected high and strong fences; that he threatens to sue her if she enters upon his land, that there are improvements on her land and her own home is there; that the best and shortest way to a highway is over the appellee's land and that the distance is sixty rods. The prayer is that the court shall establish for the plaintiff, as a way of necessity, a way to the highway across the land of the appellee. To this complaint a demurrer was sustained.

All that is presented in argument in defense of the ruling of the trial court by the appellee's counsel is that, under the Act of March 9, 1889, the action ought to have been brought in the court of the county commissioners, and that the circuit court has no jurisdiction of the subject. The appellant's counsel contend that the Act of March 9, 1889, is in violation of the Constitution and is therefore void.

The Act in question assumes to provide for the establishment of branch highways, and to give any freeholder who has no outlet to a highway the right to petition the board of county commissioners to establish a way. The Act provides that the owner of the land upon which it is proposed to establish a way may remonstrate on two grounds and no other; "first, that another convenient and less injurious route can be established over his said lands, or the lands of another; second, that the pro-

Petition for private road.

The power of locating a private road is entirely of a public nature, and a petitioner therefor having pursued the mode pointed out by the Code is entitled to the road as a matter of right. Douglas Co. v. Clark, 15 Or. 2.

The county has no authority to take a bond to indemnify it against expenses of its location and damages assessed thereon. Ibid.

A petition of a person asking for a "cartway leading from his dwelling and lands," stating that it "is the only practical way that petitioner can travel either to church, Sunday school or burying ground by wagon, buggy or cart," although informal, sufficiently alleges that he is "settled upon or cultivating land," and that the way is "necessary, reasonable and just." Warlick v. Lowman, 102 N. C. 121.

Where a person petitioning for a private way already has a private way, or by parcel license an unobstructed way, across the land of another, his petition should be denied. Warwick v. Lowman, 102 N. C. 422.

A petitioner is not entitled to have a cartway simply upon the ground that no public road leads to his land, or because it will be more convenient for him to have it, but it must appear that it is necessary, reasonable and just, and that he resides on the land, and has no way to get to and from a public road without it. Burwell v. Good, 105 N. C. 112.

ceeding is wrongful, oppressive or malicious." Elliott's Supp. §§ 1539-1542.

It is evident from the provisions to which we have just referred, and from other provisions of the Act, that the Legislature intended to grant a freeholder who is shut off from a highway a right to secure a way across the land of another upon the payment of damages. It is not made essential that the way shall be one required by the public, for the whole scope and tenor of the Act indicate that it was intended to secure a right of way to private property owners. That this was the intention is evident from the introductory part of the first section wherein it is provided "that, whenever any freeholder of this State owning lands surrounded by the lands of others, and over which he must necessarily travel in order to reach his own lands, and there is no other outlet to the public road, shall petition the board of commissioners of the county in which the lands necessary to be traveled are situate for the location of a branch highway thereon, setting forth facts in his petition which shall be verified, such board, if it be satisfied that notice has been served upon the owner of such other lands, at least ten days before the meeting of the board at which such petition is to be presented, shall appoint three disinterested persons to view such highway."

The provision is an influential one, for it declares what the petition shall contain, and it is in harmony with other provisions of the Act, for all the influential provisions indicate and express an intention to authorize the seizure of property for private way. The provision as to what the petition shall show, the rigid and emphatic restriction of the questions that may be presented by the property owner whose land it is proposed to seize, and the provisions declaring what questions shall be tried, all combine to prove that the Act was intended to authorize the seizure of property for a private way, and to compel an unwilling property owner to yield his land for that purpose. It is impossible to construe the Act as one authorizing only the establishment of public roads, for it will bear no such construction. Nor is it possible to effect a separation of its provisions, for they are so blended that severance is impossible; and as the provisions are inseparable, the Act must be taken in its entirety. Griffin v. State, 119 Ind. 520; State v. Indiana & O. O. G. & Min. Co., 120 Ind. 575; Baldwin v. Franks, 120 U. S. 678 [80 L. ed. 766]; Virginia Coupon Cases, 114 U. S. 269 [29 L. ed. 185]; Trade Mark Cases, 100 U. S. 82 [25 L. ed. 550]; United States v. Rear, 98 U. S. 314 [25 L. ed. 563].

It is true that in the preamble and in some of the provisions in the body of the Act, there is an indirect assertion that the use for which authority is conferred to seize private property is a public one, but such an assertion, even if made in the clearest terms, cannot rescue the Act from condemnation, for it is not within the power of the Legislature to determine what is a public use within the meaning of the Constitution. Whether the use is a public one is a judicial question and not a legislative one. Badler v. Langham, 84 Ala. 311; Re Deansville Cemetery Assn., 66 N. Y. 569; Bankhead v. Brown, 25 Iowa, 540; Tyler v. Beecher, 44 Vt. 448; Re St. Paul & N. P. R. Co., 34 Minn. 237, 8 L. R. A.

Swannah v. Hancock, 91 Mo. 54, 8 West. Rep. 348; Concord R. Co. v. Grady, 17 N. H. 47; Remondet v. Leopold, 106 Ind. 20, 2 West. Rep. 674.

A private use cannot be transformed into a public one by a mere legislative declaration.

As the Act assumes to authorize the seizure of the property of one citizen for the benefit of another, it cannot be upheld. Our own decisions declare that land cannot be seized for a private road, and they are well sustained by the decisions of other courts. Wild v. Deig, 43 Ind. 453; Stewart v. Hartman, 46 Ind. 331; Sunray v. Hunger, 43 Ind. 44; Blackman v. Holmes, 73 Ind. 515.

The doctrine of our case is sanctioned by Judge Cooley, and many decisions asserting the same rule are cited by him. Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th ed. 637.

We are compelled to sustain the contention of the appellant, and adjudge the Act of March 9, 1889, to be void because it violates the provisions of the Constitution. As that Act is without force, the circuit court had jurisdiction of the subject, and the only question is whether the complaint states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

In the case of Anderson v. Buchanan, 3 Ind. 133, the court quoted with approval from Chancellor Kent the following statement: "Thus, if a man sells land to another which is wholly surrounded by his own land, in this case the purchaser is entitled to a right of way over the other's ground to arrive at his own land." 3 Kent, Com. 420.

This is an apt illustration of the old and familiar doctrine of ways by necessity, and the doctrine has often been given effect by our decisions. Steel v. Grigsby, 79 Ind. 184; Sunray v. Hunger, 43 Ind. 44; Stewart v. Hartman, 46 Ind. 331.

If the appellant's grantor had remained the owner of the land now owned by the appellee, it is clear that she would be entitled to a way, as of necessity, to the public road. Kimball v. Cooksboro R. Co., 37 N. H. 448, 50 Am. Dec. 1877.

A way by necessity exists by grant, and the grant is an implied one. Nichols v. Lucas, 24 Pick. 103, 35 Am. Dec. 302.

The theory is that where land is sold that has no outlet, the vendor grants one over the parcel of which he retains the ownership. It results from this that a way of necessity cannot be successfully claimed over the land of a stranger, and if the appellant were asserting a right of way over a stranger's land she could not succeed. If the appellee occupies the position of a stranger, then the appellant must fail; but if he occupies the position as to her that the common grantor did before he parted with title, then she is entitled to the relief she prays. In our judgment, the appellee is in the position of his grantor in so far as the question before us is concerned, and must yield the appellant a right of way. As the law implied a grant at the time the common grantor conveyed to the appellant, and as that grant was prior to the conveyance to the appellee, the latter must carry into effect his predecessor's implied grant.

In Taylor v. Wernaby, 55 Cal. 350, both parties claimed, as do the parties before us, through a common grantor, and it was held that the party whose land was surrounded was entitled to a way as of necessity across the land of the other. The decision in the case referred to is sustained by the doctrine, maintained by the ancient and the modern authorities, that the original grantor grants, as appurtenant to the parcel expressly conveyed, a way which will enable his grantee to obtain access to the corporeal property expressly conveyed to him. Both the corporeal property and the incorporeal right pass from the grantor at the same time, one as the inseparable incident of the other, and a subsequent grantee must necessarily take the land conveyed to him subject to the burden created by the implied grant.

Our ultimate conclusion is that the action was properly brought in the circuit court, and that such facts are stated in the complaint as require an answer.

Judgment reversed.

William MERRELL, Appt.,

Rebecca A. SPRINGER,

(....Ind....)

The owner of a note which was, after maturity, surreptitiously taken, without his knowledge or consent, from his possession by its nominal payee and sold to a third party, may recover it from the purchaser although the latter paid value for it and had no notice of the defect in the title of his vendor.

(April 30, 1890.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Fayette County in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, in an action brought to recover possession of a certain promissory note. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Messrs. R. Conner and H. L. Frost for appellant.

Messrs. G. G. Flores and J. H. Claypool for appellee.

Coffey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of replevin to recover the possession of a promissory note alleged to be the property of the appellee, and wrongfully detained from her by the appellant.

The only questions discussed by counsel in their respective briefs relate to the alleged error of the circuit court in overruling the appellant's motion for a new trial.

The evidence in the cause tends to prove that the appellee, in November, 1873, deposited with the maker of the note in controversy the sum of $25, and took a note therefor in the name of her son, Orin Springer, who was then about five years old. The note was taken in the name of her son for the reason that the husband of the appellee was much addicted to becoming intoxicated, and was in the habit of appropriating the appellee's property to his own use. To prevent him from obtaining possession of the money represented by this note it was taken in the name of the son, but was kept in the possession of the appellee. The note was renewed from time to time, covering other small deposits, until the 16th day of December, 1884, when the present note for $160 was executed. All the money represented by the note was the money of the appellee. In August, 1888, the son, without the knowledge or consent of the appellee, took the note from a bureau drawer in her possession, and sold it to the appellant.

The theory of the appellant was that the appellee, by making the note in controversy payable to her son, constituted him her trustee, and that as he assigned the note to the appellant, who had no notice of the secret trust between the appellee and her son, the appellant acquired a good title to the note. Acting upon that theory the appellant, at the proper time, prayed the court to give the jury the following instructions, viz.:

"3. If the plaintiff, Rebecca Springer, furnished all the consideration for the execution of the note in question, but had the same made payable to Orin Springer for the purpose and with the understanding that he should hold the legal title to the same in trust for her, and that he has never since the execution of said note transferred his title to the plaintiff; that the said Orin Springer, before the bringing of this suit, for a valuable consideration, by his indorsement in writing, assigned said note to the defendant, and that the defendant, at the time said note was transferred to him, had no knowledge that anyone except said Orin Springer had any interest in said note; and that he purchased the same in good faith and for a valuable consideration, relying upon the apparent title said Orin Springer had to said note,—then, in such case, you should find for the defendant.

"4. If said Rebecca Springer furnished all the consideration for the execution of the note in question, but had the same made payable to Orin Springer, and he has never since the execution of the same transferred his title to said note to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff took said note into her possession, and kept the same where said Orin had free and ready access to the same, and said Orin, without the knowledge or consent of said plaintiff, took said note into his possession, and the defendant in good faith and for a valuable consideration, and relying upon the apparent title thus conferred upon said Orin Springer, purchased said note of him without any knowledge of the claim of the plaintiff to said note; and the said Orin Springer, in pursuance of said purchase, on the 2d day of August, 1888, indorsed said note to the defendant,—then, in such case, you should find for the defendant."

The court refused to give these instructions, but instructed the jury as follows:

"8. If the jury believe that said Rebecca Springer furnished all the consideration for the note in question; that said note was made payable to her son, Orin Springer, by the direction of the said plaintiff, Rebecca Springer; that at the time of its execution it was placed in her hands, and that she never voluntarily parted with the possession thereof, and that Orin Springer, the payee, got possession of said note surreptitiously, without the knowledge or consent of said Rebecca Springer, and while so holding the same he indorsed and transferred the same to the defendant Merrell, and the plaintiff, Rebecca Springer, before the commencement of this suit, demanded the possession of said note from the defendant Merrell,—in such case the plaintiff will be entitled to recover, although the defendant may have paid a valuable consideration therefor, and had no notice that said Orin Springer was not the owner of said note."

The note in controversy is not negotiable by the law-merchant, and was sold and assigned to the appellant after maturity. In such case the purchaser must inquire as to the title of his assignor, and as to the defenses against the note in the hands of the assignor. Kastner v. Pibilinski, 96 Ind. 229; Sims v. Wilson, 47 Ind. 226; Robeson v. Roberts, 20 Ind. 155; Schaffer v. Rilly, 50 N. Y. 61; Bush v. Lathrop, 23 N. Y. 535.

It seems to be settled in this State that a purchaser of such a note can acquire no better title than that held by his vendor.

In Summer v. Huston, 48 Ind. 228, it was said by this court: "It is a familiar principle that no man can confer a greater interest in, or title to, personal property than he has himself, and this principle is as applicable to choses in action (paper governed by the law-merchant of course excepted) as to any other species of personalty. The principle that the purchaser of the legal title to real estate, without notice of an outstanding equity, takes it discharged of the equity, has no application in the case of the purchase of a chose in action. It is a general and well-settled principle that the assignee of a chose in action takes it subject to the same equity it was subject to in the hands of the assignor."

This was but a repetition of what was said in the case of Robeson v. Roberts, 20 Ind. 155. It was further said in this case that "an abuse of a trust can confer no rights on the party abusing it, nor on those who claim in privity with him."

To the same effect are Sims v. Wilson, 47 Ind. 226, and Payne v. Juns, 93 Ind. 259.

The doctrine that where one of two innocent parties must suffer, the party who put it in the power of the wrong-doer to perpetrate the wrong must suffer the loss, has no application to this case, for there is no evidence in the cause tending to contradict the evidence of the appellee that Orin Springer took the note from her bureau drawer without her knowledge or consent. See authorities above cited.

Under the rules as established by these cases we are constrained to hold that the court did not err in refusing to give the jury the instructions asked, and that the instruction given upon the subject now under consideration states the true rule.

This case is clearly distinguishable from the case of Moore v. Moore, 112 Ind. 149, 11 West. Rep. 229. In that case the party claiming title had indorsed and delivered the note then in dispute, with the intention of vesting in the assignee title, and it was correctly held that as the note had passed to an innocent purchaser for value, without notice of any fraud by which the assignment was procured, that the assignor was estopped from reclaiming the note from such innocent purchaser. That case rests upon the principle announced in Parrish v. Thurston, 87 Ind. 487, and Curme v. Rauh, 100 Ind. 247.

The appellant also discusses in his brief other questions appearing in the record relating to the admission and rejection of evidence. We have carefully examined these questions, as well as all others presented and discussed, but are unable to discover any error in the ruling of the circuit court.

Judgment affirmed.

Charles E. CATLIN, Receiver, etc., of Clapp & Davies, Appt.,

WILCOX SILVER PLATE CO.

(.....Ind.....)

The right of a receiver appointed by a foreign tribunal to wind up an insolvent partnership situated within its jurisdiction, to take possession of money due to such partnership from domestic debtors, will not be recognized as against the claims of nonresident creditors of the insolvent partnership who have attached such money under the domestic laws after the appointment of the receiver but before he obtained actual possession of the money or an enforceable lien thereon, even although he has received a general assignment of the partnership property.

APPEAL by intervenor from a judgment of the Circuit Court for La Porte County in favor of plaintiffs in an attachment suit brought to recover a debt due by the concern of which the intervenor was receiver out of money due such concern. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. L. A. Cole, for appellant:

Where two courts, of substantially concurrent jurisdiction, attempt to assert jurisdiction of the same matter, that court which takes the first step will retain the jurisdiction till the end, and the other cannot lawfully interfere.

Taylor v. Curry, 61 U. S. 20 How. 583 (15

NOTE.—Foreign receivers.

Receivers appointed in one jurisdiction are not entitled as of right to recognition in other jurisdictions. See note to Humphreys v. Hopkins (Cal.) 8 L. R. A. 732.

A receiver of partnership assets, appointed by a competent court of another State, may maintain an action in New Jersey to set aside a sale of the assets situate in New Jersey by one partner in fraud of the other, when there are no creditors of the firm and the only one to be benefited is the partner defrauded. Boberzheimer v. Wheeler (N. J.) Aug. 16, 1889.

The possession of a receiver appointed in one jurisdiction, of the personal property of a debtor taken by him under order of court, does not exempt it, when taken into another jurisdiction, from attachment by creditors therein, or give the receiver any right to hold the property against the claims of such attaching creditors. *Humphreys v. Mitchell, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question for decision arises upon the following facts:

Clapp & Davies, partners doing business in the City of Chicago, were indebted to certain judgment creditors residing in that city. They were also indebted to the Wilcox Silver Plate Company, and others, who were residents of the State of Connecticut. At the same time Bagley & Oberreich, partners, residing and doing business at La Porte, Indiana, were indebted in a considerable sum to Clapp & Davies. One of the judgment creditors instituted proceedings in chancery against the latter firm, by filing a creditor's bill in the Superior Court of Cook County. In aid of its jurisdiction in the proceeding thus instituted, that court appointed the appellant, Catlin, receiver, and by an order made on the 14th day of April, 1887, required Clapp & Davies to execute a general deed of assignment transferring all their partnership property and effects to the receiver. Subsequently, in the month of June, the Wilcox Silver Plate Company instituted a suit in attachment in the La Porte Circuit Court against Clapp & Davies, and summoned Bagley & Oberreich to answer as garnishees. The other Connecticut creditors became parties to this last proceeding under § 943, Rev. Stat. 1881. Thereupon Catlin, as receiver of the Superior Court of Cook County, intervened by leave of the La Porte Circuit Court, and asserted the right, in virtue of his appointment as receiver and the assignment made to him, to take and hold the debt due Clapp & Davies, from Bagley & Oberreich.

The controversy, as will appear, involves the right to the fund in the hands of the garnishee-defendants, and the question presented is, Are the rights of the nonresident attaching creditors paramount, in the courts of this State, to those of the receiver of the Superior Court of Cook County, whose appointment antedates the issuing of the writ of attachment? The solution of the question depends upon the extent of power which a court of general jurisdiction, sitting in one State, can exercise over property whose actual situs is within the jurisdiction of the courts of a foreign State.

A receiver is nothing more than an officer or creature of the court that appoints him. His acts are those of the court, whose jurisdiction may be aided, but in no wise enlarged or extended, by his appointment. His power is only co-extensive with that of the court which gives him his official character. While it has been held that a court may appoint a receiver and authorize him to take possession of property in a foreign jurisdiction, the doctrine is universal that the appointment confers no legal authority which the receiver can exert over the property without the aid of the courts in whose jurisdiction it is found. The appointment, of its own force, gives him the right to take possession of the property, but it confers upon him no power to compel the recognition of that right, outside the jurisdiction of the court making the appointment. High, Receivers, § 47, p. 241.

While there are authorities of great weight which seem to hold that a receiver appointed in one jurisdiction will not be permitted to maintain a suit in a foreign State, the generally prevailing doctrine, upon which all the decisions seem to be harmonious, is that, upon the principles of comity, the courts of the jurisdiction in which the property or fund is situate will recognize the rights of the receiver, so far as to aid him in reducing it to possession, unless to do so would in some way violate the local policy or interfere with the rights of resident creditors. Mattner v. Bauer, 98 Ind. 425, and cases cited; Beach, Receivers, §§ 16, 19, 630.

Merchants Nat. Bank v. McLeod, 88 Ohio St. 174.

But the recognition of well-established principles of comity and courtesy between courts of different jurisdiction is one thing, while the rights of resident or other attaching creditors, who are seeking to avail themselves of legal proceedings authorized by statutes of the State, for the appropriation of a fund belonging to a nonresident debtor, must be determined upon altogether different principles. As has in effect been said, courts are prepared to extend comity where there is no reason to the contrary, especially if there is no interest of their own citizens or of the citizens of another State, who are asking the protection of their laws, injuriously affected by such recognition. Paine v. Lester, 44 Conn. 196; Miles v. Morston, 6 Binn. 361.

The rule may be considered as established that a receiver may invoke the aid of a foreign court, in obtaining possession of property or funds within its jurisdiction, to which he is entitled; but aid will only be extended as against those who were parties, or in some way in privity with the proceedings in the court in which his appointment was made, or who are in possession of the property or fund to which the receiver has a right; and not against creditors of a nonresident debtor, who are seeking to subject the property or fund to the payment of their debts, by proceedings duly instituted for that purpose. Accordingly, in Hurd v. Erisabeth, 41 N. J. L. 1, the court said: "That the officer of a foreign court should not be permitted, as against the claims of creditors resident here, to remove from this State assets of the debtor, is a proposition that appears to be overruled by all the decisions."

The principle upon which the decisions rest is, that it is the policy of every government to retain within its control the property of a foreign debtor until all domestic claims have been satisfied, and hence the right of the receiver of a foreign court to sue, which is allowed only upon considerations of comity, will be denied when it comes in conflict with the interests of domestic creditors. "We decline," said the court in Bank v. St. John, 20 Barb. 845, "to extend our wonted courtesy so far as to work detriment to citizens of our own State, who have been induced to give credit to the foreign insolvent." Regby v. Atlantic, M. & O. R. Co. 86 Pa. 201; Looming P. Ins. Co. v. Wright, 65 Vt. 526; Thurston v. Rosenfeld, 42 Mo. 474, 87 Am. Dec. 351; Willits v. Weiss, 25 N. Y. 577.

It follows, hence, that the available legal authority of a receiver is co-extensive only with the jurisdiction of the court by which he was appointed when the right of precedence or priority of creditors is asserted in respect to property or funds of a nonresident debtor, which the receiver has not yet reduced to possession. Hunt v. Columbian Ins. Co. 55 Me. 290; Warren v. Union Nat. Bank, 7 Phila. 156; Booth v. Clark, 58 U. S. 17 How. 229 [15 L. ed. 164]; State v. Jacksonville, P. & M. R. Co. 15 Fla. 201; Farmers & M. Ins. Co. v. Nardien, 52 Mo. 17; Taylor v. Columbian Ins. Co. 14 Allen, 353.

It is said, however, that as Clapp & Davies were residents of the State of Illinois at the time the receiver was appointed, the debt due them from Bagley & Oberreich was within the jurisdiction of the Superior Court of Cook County, upon the principle that the domicile draws to it the personal property and choses in action of the owner, wherever they may be situated. Hence, the contention is, that as the appointment of the appellant as receiver was followed by a general deed of assignment, valid in the State of Illinois, it must be regarded as valid here, and as divesting Clapp & Davies of all title or interest in the debt in controversy after the date of the assignment. It is, of course, well settled that personal property is transferable according to the law of the owner's domicile, and that a voluntary assignment or transfer made without compulsion or legal coercion is to be governed everywhere by that law, unless the contract by which the transfer was made is limited or restrained by some policy of positive enactment of the State in which the property is situated, or unless it affects citizens of the latter State injuriously. Ames Iron Works v. Warren, 76 Ind. 512; Martin v. Potter, 11 Gray, 87, 71 Am. Dec. 649; Weider v. Maddox, 66 Tex. 373, 36 Am. Rep. 617; Warner v. Jafton, 96 N. Y. 248; Green v. Van Buakirk, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 150 [19 L. ed. 113]; Ashro v. LaCygne Rock Bank, 80 Mo. 366; Law v. Mills, 18 Pa. 145; Burrill, Assignm. 301, Story, Conf. L. 343 390.

"The voluntary transfer of a chattel by the debtor, if not forbidden in other respects by the law at the place of the situs, is to be as much regarded there or elsewhere as it would be at the place of the domicile." Leary v. Hall, 2 Watts & S. 181; Smith's App. 104 Pa. 381; Chase v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 71 Me. 514, 36 Am. Rep. 345. See 15 Am. L. Rev. 251.

Such an assignment will not be upheld, however, if it contravenes the policy of the law of the place where the property is situated. Gutlander v. Howell, 85 N. Y. 657; Kaukaer v. Hyman, 142 Mass. 53, 2 New Eng. Rep. 181; Marr v. Church, 70 Iowa, 208; De Waite, 99 N. Y. 438.

The principles above stated are applicable only to transfers or assignments of property which rest essentially on contract and are voluntary in the sense that they are the product of a will acting without legal compulsion. Property in a foreign State that has passed from an assignor to an assignee by a voluntary deed, and not by proceedings in facitum, by process of law is distinguished from like property in the hands of a receiver by operation of law, or by an assignment made under legal compulsion.

Assignments of the latter class are held inoperative upon property not situated within the territory over which the laws that make or compel the debtor to make them have dominion. Rhawn v. Peares, 110 Ill. 850; Smith's App. and Weider v. Maddox, supra.

Involuntary assignments which are made under foreign Insolvent Laws, have no operation outside of the State under whose laws they were made, while a voluntary assignment is a personal common law right, possessed by every owner of property, and may operate in one State as well as another. Walters v. Whitlock, 9 Fla. 66, 76 Am. Dec. 607.

Some conflict or contrariety of opinion may be found in the decisions in respect to what may or may not constitute a voluntary assignment under the statutes of different States, but it is unnecessary to enter upon a discussion of the cases relating to voluntary assignments, as all the authorities agree that where an assignment is made under compulsion of law, or where property is taken ad iudicium, the transfer will not be regarded as voluntary, nor will it be effectual beyond the jurisdiction in which it was made, when it conflicts with the interests of citizens in a foreign jurisdiction. As we have seen, a court cannot extend its jurisdiction by the appointment of a receiver, so it is equally powerless to do so by coercing an assignment of the property in controversy. An assignment is regarded merely as a matter of convenience in aid of the jurisdiction of the court, the established doctrine being that, as against nonresident creditors, the assignment confers no additional or higher right to the property than the receiver had by virtue of his appointment. Idings v. Brown, 4 Sandf. Ch. 381; Hugh, Receivers, § 443.

While it is true, as has been remarked before, the domicile of the owner, in legal contemplation, draws to it his personal estate, wherever it may be, yet as this is so only by fiction of law, the rule is not of universal application. When, by the law and policy of the State where the property is actually located, it is subject to the process of attachment or garnishment at the suit of a domestic or other creditor, the fiction yields, and the actual situs of the property determines whether or not it should be subjected to the process of the court. Warner v. Jaffray and Green v. Van Burskirk, supra.

In cases of attachment and garnishment, like those for founding administration, the situs of a debt is the residence of the debtor. Wyman v. Halstead, 100 U. S. 634 [27 L. ed. 1008]; Green v. Miller, 10 Ohio St. 138.

It is said, however, that the principles of comity which control in aid of the receiver of a foreign court, who is seeking to obtain possession of a fund, should only be suspended in their operation in favor of domestic creditors, and that inasmuch as the attaching creditors in the present case are all nonresidents of the State, the aid of the court should have been extended to the receiver and denied the creditors. While this position is not without support, it is not in our view maintainable. Although nonresidents, the attaching creditors are properly in our courts, pursuing a remedy which the Statute confers upon foreign as well as domestic creditors. Until the Legislature shall declare a different policy, the rights of a foreign creditor against the property of a debtor must be regarded by the courts as in all respects the same as those of resident creditors, so far as respects proceedings in attachment and garnishment. The rule which commends itself to our judgment is thus declared: "Once properly in the court and accepted as a suitor, neither the law, nor court administering the law, will admit any distinction between the citizen of its own State and that of another. Before the law and its tribunals, there can be no preference of one over the other." Hibernia Nat. Bank v. Loombe, 84 N. Y. 307; Rhoads v. Pearce, Warner v. Jaffray and Faine v. Lester, supra.

This rule governs the more recent decisions.

The conclusions above stated lead to an affirmance of the judgment.

Judgment affirmed, with costs.

.....(And).....

In case one, who has sold furniture for a hotel and contracted with the proprietor to deliver it by or on a certain date, knowing the purpose for which it is to be used and that it is necessary for the operation of the hotel, fails to deliver it until long after the appointed time, thereby preventing the renting of the rooms to guests, he is liable for the loss sustained by reason of such failure; and such loss may be determined by finding the difference between the value, for the purpose for which they were intended, of the rooms furnished and unfurnished during the time they could not be used for such purpose.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Elkhart County allowing defendant's claim to a set-off and rendering judgment against it thereon, in an action to recover the contract price for certain furniture sold and delivered. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs W. H. Vesoy, C. W. Miller and J. M. Vanfleet for appellant.

Messrs H. D. Wilson and W. J. Davis for appellee.

Olds, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action by the appellant against the appellee to recover a balance of $374.63 for goods sold and delivered.

The answer is in three paragraphs, setting up a counterclaim:

1. It is alleged in the first paragraph that on August 20, 1881, the appellee had just completed his hotel with fifty rooms, and was in need of new furniture therefor, without which he could not carry on his business, as appellant well knew; that on said day, for the purpose of furnishing said hotel in all its parts with suitable furniture, the appellant agreed with him to furnish said furniture and every part thereof complete, and set it up in proper shape and condition in his hotel rooms ready for use by September 15, 1881; that said rooms were irregular and different in size, dimension and construction, and for the purpose of making said furniture suitable for said rooms, appellant measured said rooms, and a list of goods was agreed upon, and at the foot thereof appellant executed a memorandum in writing as follows:

We agree to put these goods all in good order (set up in hotel without charge except freight and cartage), castored, with bracket, wood-wheels on all beds. All bureaus and washstands to have good wood-wheels on rubber castors. Goods to be ready the 15th of Sept. Any goods not according to order, or not satisfactory, may be returned free of charge, Goanen, Aug. 26, 1881.

Berkey & Gay Furniture Co.
T. M. Mendley.

The paragraph then alleges that he was ready, able and willing to comply with his part of said contract, but that appellant, with full knowledge of all the facts, violated said agreement, in this, to wit: It failed to deliver any of said goods prior to September 30, 1881, whereby he lost the daily use of twenty nine rooms, of the rental value of $3 per day for each room from September 18 to September 30; that appellant failed to deliver said goods prior to January 18, 1882, except as set forth in the complaint, that said furniture was purchased to be delivered in sets and suits for specific rooms and places, as set forth in said foregoing memorandum, but the articles so delivered were not in sets or suits, but in disjointed and unmatched pieces, and were not and could not be properly set up or used until all were delivered, by reason of which he lost the daily rental value and use of twenty of said rooms, worth to defendant $3 each per day from October 1, 1881, to January 18, 1882, inclusive; that because of such failure he was compelled to turn away and did turn away twenty persons each day, who desired to become guests at said hotel, whereby the income and profits of said hotel business were diminished $50 per day.

The second paragraph of the counterclaim alleges that on the 20th day of August, 1881, he had just completed his hotel at a cost of $40,000; that it contained forty rooms (besides dining-room, kitchen, etc.) suitable for the entertainment of guests; that it was then operated and run by him in the business of hotel-keeping, and was so operated for the next two years, that the rental value of said hotel, when furnished, was $5,800 per year, that on said 20th day of August, 1881, he was in great need of furniture to supply and furnish thirty of the aforesaid guest rooms in said hotel, which rooms were then unfurnished and empty, in which condition they were of no rental value to defendant, all of which appellant well knew; that to supply and furnish said rooms and hotel as aforesaid, appellant promised and agreed with him to deliver and set up in good order and condition the furniture mentioned in its complaint by the 15th day of September, 1881, according to written specifications and agreement (copied into first paragraph above); that appellant failed and refused to deliver said goods until January 18, 1882, during which time, from September 18, 1881, to January 18, 1882, he was deprived of the use and rental value of said hotel and the several rooms therein, which use and rental was of the value of $9,000.

3. The third paragraph of the counterclaim alleges all the matters contained in the other two paragraphs, showing a little more minutely the rooms for which the different articles of furniture were designed.

A reply in general denial was filed to the answer. The cause was submitted to a jury for trial, and the jury returned a special verdict in the words and figures following:

SPECIAL VERDICT.

1. We, the jury, find that the plaintiff contracted with the defendant, on the 20th day of August, 1881, to sell and deliver to defendant the several items of property mentioned in plaintiff's complaint at and for the price of $ L. R. A.

each article as stated in plaintiff's complaint, and was to deliver the same and set the same up in defendant's hotel in Goschen, Indiana, and have the same ready for use in defendant's hotel, known as Hotel Hascall, by or on the 15th day of September, 1881. That plaintiff at the time of making such contract knew the purpose for which said furniture was to be used.

2. Plaintiff failed and neglected to deliver any of said furniture until the 30th day of September, 1881, and thereupon and thereafter until the 10th day of January, 1882, plaintiff delivered said furniture at the times, and in the specific articles, as severally set forth by the plaintiff in the complaint herein.

3. Defendant paid plaintiff the sums credited to defendant in plaintiff's complaint and returned to plaintiff the items of furniture, as stated in plaintiff's complaint, to the amount of $121.85, thus leaving unpaid of the purchase price of said furniture the sum of $274.00, March, 1882, as stated by the plaintiff.

4. We further find that defendant, at and just prior to the making of said contract, had reconstructed and built his hotel building in the City of Goschen, Indiana, at a cost of $40,000, and defendant was proprietor and manager thereof, and had within said hotel thirty (30) rooms that were unfurnished, and when so unfurnished were of no use or value to the defendant; that all said rooms remained vacant, and of no use or value to defendant, from the 15th day of September, 1881, to the 30th day of September, 1881, on account and by reason of the failure of plaintiff to comply with its agreement aforesaid, that twenty-three (23) of said rooms remained vacant, and of no use to defendant, from the 30th day of September, 1881, until the 19th day of October, 1881, because of the failure of plaintiff to comply with said contract; that seven (7) of said rooms remained vacant and of no use, from the 19th day of October, 1881, to the 5th day of November, 1881, because of the failure of plaintiff to comply with said contract, that from the 5th day of November, 1881, until December 15, 1881, six (6) rooms of said hotel remained vacant and of no use to defendant, because of the non-fulfillment of said contract by the plaintiff; that the use of each one of said rooms to the defendant was nothing when unfurnished.

5. We further find that the rental value and use of each of said rooms, when furnished with the furniture designated for same in said contract, would have been to the defendant 75 cents per day, during said time.

6. If, upon the foregoing facts, the law be with the plaintiff, then we find for the plaintiff, but if the law be with the defendant, then we find for the defendant.

John A. Smith, Foreman.

The appellant moved for judgment on the special verdict, which motion was overruled and an exception reserved. The appellee moved for judgment on the special verdict and the court sustained said motion, to which the appellant excepted. Final judgment was then entered in favor of appellee for $274.00, and costs.

Appellant filed a motion for new trial, which was overruled and exceptions reserved. The appellant assigns as error:

1. That the court erred in overruling appellant's motion for judgment in its favor upon the special verdict.

2. That the court erred in sustaining appellee's motion for judgment in his favor on the special verdict.

3. That the court erred in overruling appellant's motion for new trial.

It is contended that, under the facts found, the appellee is only entitled to compensatory or general damages, and not for the special damages set up as a counterclaim.

We think the facts found in the special verdict entitled the appellee to recover the special damages claimed.

In Victory v. McCormick, 117 Ind. 394-397, the court says: "The general rule is, that a party who fails to comply with his contract to furnish goods is liable for the value of the goods in the open market at the time of the failure. But when similar goods cannot be purchased in the market, the measure of damages is the actual loss sustained by the purchaser in not receiving the goods according to the contract."

See Rahn v. Deig, 131 Ind. 303, and authorities there cited.

In Hedley v. Brendale, 9 Exch. 341—Hedgwick, Leading Cases on the Measure of Damages, pp. 126-126—the court states what we deem to be the true rule governing the assessment of damages in such cases as this. In that case it is said: "When two parties have made a contract which one of them has broken, the damages which the other party ought to receive in respect of such breach of contract should be such as may fairly and reasonably be considered either arising naturally, i. e., according to the usual course of things, from such breach of contract itself, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties at the time they made the contract as the probable result of the breach of it."

The facts found by the jury show that the appellee, at and just prior to August 26, 1881, had reconstructed and built his hotel building in the City of Gosben, Indiana, at a cost of $40,000, and that appellee was proprietor and manager thereof, and had within said hotel thirty rooms that were unfurnished, and when so unfurnished were of no use or value to the appellee; that upon said day he contracted with the appellant to sell and deliver to him the several items of property mentioned in the appellant's complaint, which consisted of the necessary furniture to furnish said rooms at and for the price of each article as stated in the complaint, and agreed to deliver the same and set the same up in appellee's hotel, and have the same ready for use in said hotel by or on the 15th day of September, 1881; that the appellant, at the time of making of said contract, knew the purpose for which said furniture was to be used. The contract was to furnish the furniture for thirty rooms in a hotel and set it up in the rooms, and have it ready for use and occupancy by a day named. From these facts it necessarily follows as a conclusion that the party contracting to furnish the same knew that the rooms were valueless as hotel apartments when unfurnished; that the furniture was necessary to enable the purchaser to use and occupy the same, and operate his hotel, and that the appellee would be deprived of the use of such rooms for such purpose until it complied with its contract.

The facts found further show that the appellant commenced furnishing the furniture soon after the date when it was all to have been furnished and put up in the rooms, furnishing part at one time and part at another. The facts show the appellee had reconstructed and rebuilt a valuable hotel, and was operating it himself, and the damages naturally resulting from the breach of the contract, according to the facts found, were what the rooms would have been worth to appellee furnished according to the contract more than they were worth to him unfurnished, during the delay in complying with the contract. Appellee built the house for a particular purpose, and was having it furnished for such purpose; he was not bound to rent out the rooms for another purpose, even if he could have done so. If there had been a breach and a total failure of the appellant to have furnished the whole or any part of the furniture, and the appellee had been notified that he was not intending to furnish it, then the appellant would have been liable for the difference in value of the furniture between the price in the open market and the contract price, as well as the loss of the use of the rooms for the time necessary to have procured the furniture elsewhere, but in this case the appellant furnished the furniture and appellee accepted it, so that the damage was the loss sustained by reason of the delay.

We think the loss of the use of the rooms as they were to be furnished might fairly be considered to have been contemplated by the parties at the time of the making of the contract.

In Richardson v. Chynoweth, 20 Wis. 450, it was held that a defendant failing to deliver an article, knowing the purpose for which it was purchased, was liable for the profits the purchaser would have made. See 1 Sutherland, Damages, 7th ed. pp. 218-220; Field, Damages, § 250; Tyre Harts v. Hudson, 119 Ind. 543, 11 West. Rep. 333.

It is contended that the facts found do not state the damages correctly; that if the plaintiff is entitled to recover, the amount he is entitled to recover would be the difference between the rental value of the rooms unfurnished and furnished. This objection we do not think available for a reversal of the judgment. When special damages of this character are recoverable, it is the damage the party himself has sustained that he is entitled to recover.

If A purchases grain of B and at the time A has a previous contract to sell and deliver grain to C, and A purchases the grain of B with a view of filling his previous contract with C, and C is advised of that fact, and the contract is such as that, on failure to deliver, B becomes liable to A for the profit he would have made, the damage recoverable is the profit A would have made; and that amount might be determined by a finding of the facts showing the amount A was to pay B for the grain, and the amount he would have received from C for the same.

So in this case, the amount of damage that the appellee was entitled to recover was the difference in value to the appellee in the rooms furnished and unfurnished, for the time they remained unfurnished by reason of appellant's failure to furnish the furniture; and that amount is determined by finding what the use of the rooms was worth to the appellee unfurnished, and what they were worth furnished, for the time he was deprived of the use of them for the purpose for which they were to be used. The jury has found as facts that the use of the rooms unfurnished was worth nothing to the appellee during that time, and furnished they would have been worth 75 cents per day; and the number of days each room was unfurnished from the date appellant contracted to set up the furniture in the rooms is also stated and found in the verdict, and the gross amount may be determined by a mere computation. The facts found in the special verdict entitle the appellee to a judgment for the amount of the damages found to have been sustained by him. Fessan v. Landry, not yet reported, this term.

The facts found cover all the issues in the case, and that is all that is required by a special verdict.

It is further contended that the court erred in not sustaining the motion for new trial, for the reason that the judgment rendered upon the verdict is in excess of the amount found due the appellee by the verdict; but this question is not presented by the record. If the judgment does not follow the verdict, or is not such a judgment as the party was entitled to have rendered upon the verdict, to present any question as to the amount or form of the judgment, it was necessary to make a motion to modify the judgment, and properly reserve exceptions in case the motion was overruled.

It follows, therefore, from the conclusion we have reached, that there is no error in the record for which the judgment should be reversed.

Judgment affirmed, with costs.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS (2d Div.)

Oceana A. BANCROFT, Appt.,

HOME BENEFIT ASSOCIATION of New York, Resp.

(...N. Y....)

1. A slight blow on the throat while engaged in fencing, which causes a person to raise a little blood in consequence of which he is confined to his bed and attended by a physician for the greater part of three days, with no further hemorrhage from the day he was struck to the date of his death a year and a half thereafter, does not constitute "any wound, hurt or serious bodily injury" within the meaning of a question in an application for life insurance.

2. The words "hurt" and "wound," in a question asked of an applicant for life insurance as to any "wound, hurt or serious bodily injury" received by him, mean an injury to the body causing an impairment of health or strength, or rendering the person more liable to contract disease, or less able to resist its effects.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the General Term of the Superior Court of the City of New York, affirming a judgment of the Special Term dismissing the complaint in an action to recover the amount alleged to be due on certain mutual benefit certificates. Reversed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. William G. Wilson for appellant.

Mr. Francis Lawton, for respondent.

Where there is a warranty of the truth of the answers contained in the application, the materiality of the questions is eliminated from the consideration of the court or jury.

Follett, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of court:

April 28, 1895, John S. Bancroft became a member of defendant's life department, and received two certificates, by each of which the defendant promised to pay, on proof of his death during the continuance of the certificate, $5,000 to the insured's wife, the plaintiff, from the benefit fund of the life department. Each certificate contains the following provisions:

"In consideration of the representations and agreements made in the application heretofore, and which is a part of this contract, and of each of the statements made therein, which every person accepting or acquiring any interest in this contract hereby adopts as his own, admits to be material and warrants to be full and true, and to be the only statements upon which this contract is made."

"I. If this certificate . . . has been or shall be obtained through misrepresentation, fraud or concealment, . . . then the same shall be absolutely void."

The application contained this question and answer: "3. Q. Have you received any wound, hurt or serious bodily injury? A. No."

The application contained the following declarations: "I do hereby declare that all the particulars and statements made by me in connection with this application are true to the best of my knowledge and belief, and I do hereby acknowledge, consent and agree that any untrue or fraudulent statement made by me, or to any medical examiner for said Association, or any concealment of facts by me, shall forfeit and cancel all rights to any benefit under the above-named contract, and expressly waive all provisions of law forbidding any physician who has withheld me from disclosing all information which he thereby acquired."

"I further declare and agree that my answers to the questions put by the medical examiner are correct and true, and that I am the person who signed the application on the opposite side, and was examined as stated."

September 19, 1885, the insured died, and this action was brought to recover the amounts insured by the certificate, and was defended at the trial on the sole ground that the answer to the question above quoted was untrue. The issue was tried before the court without a jury, which found as facts that February 21, 1884, the insured received a "wound" (5th finding), a "hurt" (6th finding), and a "serious bodily injury" (7th finding). The 8th finding of fact described with particularity the wound, hurt and serious bodily injury found in the 5th, 6th and 7th findings, and is as follows:

"Eighth. That prior to the making and delivery of the said application, and on or about the 21st day of February, 1884, the said John S. Bancroft, while engaged in fencing, did receive a blow from a fall on the throat in the neighborhood of or upon the Adam's apple, that in a few seconds thereafter he raised a little blood; that said blow produced an extravasation of the sub mucous membrane just over the cricoid cartilage in the posterior part of the throat, almost opposite or behind, but a little below, the Adam's apple; that the force of said blow produced an abrasion, wound or hurt on the inside of the windpipe; that shortly thereafter the said John S. Bancroft was confined to his bed the whole or the greater part of three days, and during that time was attended by a physician; and was by him treated with the same treatment that he gave persons who have the complaint of spitting of blood, but I find that the treatment was not for the complaint of spitting of blood."

In the 9th finding the court found that the insured recovered from the defendant the injury described in the 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th findings, and as a conclusion of law decided that the plaintiff, by reason of the answer given, was not entitled to recover. The plaintiff excepted to the 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th findings of fact, and to this sentence contained in the 9th finding: "That the force of said blow produced an abrasion, wound or hurt on the inside of the wind pipe," and now insists that they are without any evidence tending to sustain them, and are reversible in this court as questions of law.

On the evening of February 21, 1884, the insured took at his own house a lesson in fencing with foils. His body was protected by a thickly padded buckskin jacket, fitting closely and high about his neck, and his face was shielded by a visor, which were specially designed for the protection of persons engaged in this exercise. At the end of the exercise he said, as found, "a little blood," and immediately called his family physician, who, after an examination, expressed the opinion that his throat had been hit by the button of the foil, though no external mark or evidence of injury could be found. The insured was not conscious of having been hit and was quite conscious that he had not been. The physician made a careful examination, but found no evidence once that the blood came from the larynx. After the examination the patient was put to bed and treated in the manner and for the time described in the 8th finding of fact. No other hemorrhage occurred. March 2, 1884, his throat was examined by Dr. Jarvis, a specialist, who testified that by the use of a powerful light and mirrors he discovered the injury, which he described in the language used in the 8th finding. All the evidence descriptive of the injury and its effects was given by Doctors Wright, the attending physician, and Jarvis, the specialist, who were called by the defendant, and by the plaintiff, called in her own behalf. Dr. Wright testified that he had been the insured's family physician for ten or twelve years prior to May, 1885. After having described the injury and its effects, he testified: "I was his attending physician for some time after this (the accident) until he moved away from that part of the city in May, 1885. During the time that I attended him as a physician he was not at any time seriously ill with any complaint; he was not, to my knowledge, afflicted with any organic or chronic disease at that time; I do not believe that he was."

Q After all you had seen of this patient at the time of the injury, immediately after the injury, and during the time you attended him as a physician, would you call that a serious injury?

A. The result seems to justify the supposition that it was not a serious injury, but a man bleeding from the throat or lungs is always regarded as possibly a serious case; physicians always give them the benefit of the doubt under such circumstances, as though it was certainly serious.

Q On the final result of this, would you call it a serious injury?

A. I would not, for the patient got over it. Dr. Jarvis testified:

Q Did you regard this as a serious injury?

A. I cannot say that I took it in that light; it was simply to find out what the trouble was that I examined him.

Q Was it your opinion he would lose the effects of it?

A. I thought it would disappear.

The plaintiff testified that her husband spat no blood between February 21, 1884, and the date of his death. There is no conflict on the evidence and there is none justifying the inference or finding that the injury was serious, or that it was a hurt or wound within the meaning of the contract.

September 14, 1886, the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company insured the life of a Mrs. Wilkinson. The application, which was a part of the contract, and its statements warranties, contained this question and answer:

Q Has the party ever met with any accidental or serious personal injury; if so, what was it?

A. No.

The insured died in 1889, and in the action on the policy the jury returned a special finding that in 1888 the insured fell from a tree, was injured in consequence thereof, was sick for some time, but that she recovered, and that the injury had no permanent influence on her health. The fact that the insured had fallen and had been somewhat injured was not disclosed to the insurer. It was held that the injury was not within the meaning of the contract a serious one. Wilkinson v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 80 Iowa, 118.

At about the same time the Union Mutual Life Insurance Company of Maine insured the same life. This application, which was also a part of the contract, and its statements warranties, contained this question and answer:

Q Has the party ever had any serious illness, local disease or personal injury; if so, of what nature and at what age?

A. No.

The accident which had happened to the insured was not disclosed to the insurer. On the trial of the issue joined, the jury returned a special finding that in 1898 the insured fell from a tree, was injured, but not seriously, and that its effects passed away without subsequently affecting her health. The fact that the insured had so fallen was not disclosed to the insurer. It was held that the injury described by the evidence and found by the jury was not a serious one, within the meaning of the contract, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover. Wilkinson v. Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. 2 Dillon, 570; Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Wilkinson, 80 U. S. 18 Wall, 222 [20 L. ed. 617].

In discussing the case, the meaning of the term "serious bodily injury" when used in life policies was discussed. The court said: "On the first branch of the case the court said to the jury that, if the effects of the fall were temporary, and had entirely passed away before the application was taken, and if it did not affect Mrs. Wilkinson's health or shorten her life, then the nondisclosure of the fall was no defense to the action. On the other hand, if the effects of the fall were not temporary, and remained when the application was taken, or if the fall affected the general health or was so serious that it might affect the health or shorten life, then the nondisclosure would defeat recovery, although the failure to mention the fall was not intentional or fraudulent.

"It is insisted by the counsel for the defendant that if the injury was considered serious at the time, it is one which must be mentioned in reply to the interrogatory, and that whether any further inquiry is expedient on the subject of its permanent influence on the health, is for the insurer to determine before making insurance. But there are grave and obvious difficulties in this construction. The accidents resulting in personal injuries, which at the moment are considered by the parties serious, are so very numerous that it would be almost impossible for a person engaged in active life to recall them at the age of forty or fifty years, and if the failure to mention all such injuries must invalidate the policy, very few would be sustained where thorough inquiry is made into the history of the party whose life is the subject of insurance. There is, besides, the question of what is to be considered a serious injury at the time. If the party gets over the injury completely, without leaving any ill consequences, in a few days it is clear that the serious aspect of the case was not a true one. Is it necessary to state the injury and explain the mistake to meet the requirements of the policy?

"On the other hand, when the question arises, as in this case, on a trial, the jury, and not the insurer, must decide whether the injury was serious or not. In deciding this, are they to reject the evidence of the ultimate effect of the injury on the party's health, longevity, strength and other similar considerations? This would be to leave out of view the essential purpose of the inquiry, and the very matters which would throw most light on the nature of the injury, with reference to its influence on the insurable character of the life proposed.

"Looking, then, to the purpose for which the information is sought by the question, and to the difficulty of answering when an injury was serious in any other manner than by reference to its permanent or temporary influence on the health, strength and longevity of the party, we are of the opinion that the court did not err in the criterion by which it directed the jury to decide the interrogatory propounded to them." See also Wilkinson v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 80 Iowa, 118.

The words "hurt" and "wound" as used in the application mean an injury to the body causing an impairment of health or strength or rendering the person more liable to contract disease or less able to resist its effects. No such consequences followed from the hurt sustained by the insured. A cut on the face, finger or on any part of the body from which blood flows, though healing in a few days and leaving no evil consequences, is a hurt or wound, but not within the meaning of the contract under consideration. There being no evidence tending to sustain the findings upon which the conclusion of law is based, the judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted, with costs to abide event.

All concur.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

GERMAN INSURANCE CO. of Freeport, Ill., Pff. in Err., vs.

Anderson GRAY.

(....Kan....)

*1. In an application for insurance,

*Held notes by JOHNSON, J.

HOLD.—Fire insurance; insured not affected by wrongful acts of company's agent.

Where an applicant for a policy answers questions truthfully, but the agent of the company inserts the answers incorrectly in the application, such agent's error cannot be imputed to the appli-that it should be considered a part of the policy and a warranty by the insured of the truth of the statements which it contained.

2. A general agent of an insurance company can modify the insurance contract, or waive a condition of a written policy by parol.

3. A provision in an insurance policy respecting incumbrances on the property insured may be waived by the insurance company or its general agent; and this, although the policy contains a printed stipulation that no agent of the company or any person other than the president or secretary shall have authority to waive any of the terms or conditions of the policy, and all agreements by the president or secretary must be signed by either of them.

4. Where proofs of loss are taken by a duly authorized adjuster of the company, who expresses satisfaction with the same, and states that he will forward them to the office of the company, and that the loss will soon be paid, the insured has a right to assume, until notified to the contrary, that no other or different proofs will be required; and the failure of the company to object to them within a reasonable time precludes it from thereafter objecting that they are insufficient.

The company cannot avoid payment because of misrepresentations as to value, location, incumbrances, etc., inserted by its agent, who had full knowledge of the facts, the assured being illiterate and placing reliance upon the agent, and having no reliable knowledge of the facts constituting such representations. *Phoenix Ins. And this is so although the application provided that the representations should be regarded as warranties. Stone v. Hawkeye Ins. Co. 68 Iowa, 727.

The act of an agent authorized to solicit and take applications for insurance in such a case is binding upon the company. Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Stark, 130 Ind. 444.

He must be deemed the agent of the company in all he does in preparing the application, and in any representation he may make as to the character or effect of the statements therein contained; and this rule is not changed by a stipulation in the policy subsequently issued, that the acts of such agent in making out the application shall be deemed the acts of the insured. Deits v. Providence-Washington Ins. Co. 31 W. Va. 351.

The company is estopped from taking advantage of the falsity of an answer in an application, where, at the time of the issue of the policy, it personally or through its agent has knowledge of the facts which the question answered is intended to elicit. Dwelling-House Ins. Co. v. Brodie (Ark.) 4 L. R. A. 693.

Where he fills out the blanks in a policy signed by an applicant in blank, without the latter's instructions or authority, he does not thereby become the agent of the applicant; and misrepresentations of such agent will not avoid the policy, although it was afterwards signed by the applicant, who did not read it or know of such misrepresentations. Rogers v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 131 Ind. 378.

Statement by Johnston, J.:

This was an action for loss by fire upon a policy of insurance executed December 4, 1885, insuring, among other property, the following, for the amounts named: barn and shed, $300; hay in barn, $900; grain in barn and in stack on cultivated premises, $1,500; farming implements, $300. The fire occurred on May 28, 1886, and the property mentioned, which is alleged to be of the total value of $3,000, was wholly destroyed by the fire. The plaintiff alleged that the contract of insurance was in full force at the time of the fire, and that the property was destroyed without any fault of his, and that he had fully complied with all the requirements and agreements of the contract, but the Insurance Company refused, and still refuses, to pay the amount of the loss. He demanded judgment in the sum of $3,900, with interest from the time of the fire. The answer alleged that in the application for insurance by Gray he warranted that all the answers made by him to questions therein propounded were true; that, in response to a question in regard to what mortgages and incumbrances were upon the property, he failed to disclose a mortgage for $5,749.85, dated March 23, 1885, in favor of John S. Woods; and, further, that Gray, after the issuance of the policy, and without the consent of the Insurance Company indorsed on the policy, and in violation of the terms of the policy, incumbered and mortgaged the property insured un-

Where an insurance agent has examined an applicant and received true answers, but omits certain answers, and the applicant signs the application under the agent's direction, the policy is not rendered null and void by such omissions, although it contains a provision that any false representation or omission in the material facts shall render the application void. Kansas Protective Union v. Gardner, 41 Kan. 397.

Plaintiff is not estopped by the fact that a copy of the application was attached to the policy, and he failed to notify the company that the statements were false. Donnelly v. Cedar Rapids Ins. Co. 70 Iowa, 634.

If the company had knowledge, when it issued the policy, that the statements made in the application as warranties were not true, it must be regarded as having waived said warranties; and it is bound by whatever knowledge its soliciting agent had when he took the application. Stone v. Hawkeye Ins. Co. 68 Iowa, 727; Mullin v. Vermont Mut. F. Ins. Co. 3 New Eng. Rep. 693, 33 Vt. 113.

The insurance agent is presumed to be familiar with the construction of the building insured, as well as its divisions, manner of use and description, and the company is bound by his knowledge. Pettit v. State Ins. Co. (Minn.) July 19, 1883.

Limitations in an insurance policy as to the powers of the agents are not conclusive; and if an act is within the scope of an agent's authority at the time it is done, it binds the corporation, without reference to restrictions in the policy. Niagara Ins. Co. v. Lee, 73 Tex. 641.

A restriction upon his powers in the policy, and not in the application, cannot be construed to refer to any act or knowledge of the agent that occurred before the delivery of the policy. Crouse v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. (Mich.) Jan. 24, 1880.

The assured is not bound by private instructions to the agent, not known to him. Commercial U. Assur. Co. v. State, 25 West. Rep. 47, 123 Ind. 393.

der the policy as follows: On May 15, 1883, he made and delivered a mortgage to A. Breckman for $3,110, upon the real estate on which the insured buildings stood, and upon 2,000 bushels of wheat in the granary, and about 800 acres of growing wheat; and, further, on December 29, 1883, that he made and delivered to Sumner County Bank a mortgage of $700 on some farming implements and other articles covered by the policy. In his reply Gray admitted the existence and the making of the mortgages mentioned in the answer, but alleged that he gave a full statement of all the incumbrances on the property when the application for insurance was made, and also made known to the defendant that the mortgages would mature during the existence of the policy, and that he would be wholly unable to meet the indebtedness or remove the incumbrances, except by making and giving new mortgages, and renewing the incumbrances on the property, and he alleges that it was expressly stipulated and agreed between himself and the Insurance Company that he should be permitted to incumber his property, and that H. Stetsbuschel & Bro., the duly authorized agents of the Company, expressly waived the condition written in the policy against incumbrances, and expressly agreed in behalf of the Company that he should have the right, notwithstanding the printed stipulations, to renew and extend the mortgages and incumbrances upon the property, or any part thereof.

Upon the trial the jury returned special findings of fact with their general verdict, as follows:

Q. Were there any chattel mortgages on the wheat covered by the insurance policy sued on in this action at the time said insurance policy was issued and delivered to Anderson Gray?

A. Yes.

(5) Q. A. Yes.

(7) Q. Were there any chattel mortgages upon any of the property covered by the insurance policy sued on in this action at the time said plaintiff claims the said property was destroyed by fire?

A. Yes.

A. 2,000 bushels wheat, $1,500; six tons hay, $18; 2 two-horse Bain wagons, $80; 1 piano box single buggy, $100; 1 ten-foot Holge header, $100; 1 Buckeye mower, $40; 1 Bradley hay-rake, $15; 1 corn planter, $45; 1 Wier double cultivator, $15; 1 grain wheel-drill, $40; 2 one-horse wheat-drills, $20; 1 wheat fanning-mill, $20; barn, $300; hayrack, $25.

(12) Q. What was the value of the plaintiff's interest in each item of said property at the time said plaintiff claims the same was destroyed by fire?

A. Same as No. 10.

(13) Q. Did the plaintiff read the written application for insurance which has been offered in evidence in the case before or at the time he signed the same?

A. No.

(14) Q. Could plaintiff at that time read writing and printing well enough to read such written application?

A. Yes.

(15) Q. Did plaintiff have an opportunity to read said written application before or at the time he signed the same?

A. Yes.

(16) Q. Did Anderson Gray, the plaintiff in this action, tell Mr. Steinbuschel, the agent of said defendant, at the time said written application for insurance was being written up, or before that time, of the existence of any mortgages upon any of the property covered by said insurance policy other than the one mentioned in said written application?

A. Yes.

(17) Q. If you answer question 16 in the affirmative, then you may state if said agent of the defendant stated to plaintiff at that time that he would not mention such mortgages in said written application?

A. Yes.

(20) Q. If all the mortgages that were upon the said property, or any part thereof, so covered by said insurance policy, were not mentioned in said written application, state fully why they were not so mentioned, and all the reasons therefor, so far as you find that they were known to plaintiff at that time?

A. Agent refused to put it in application, saying it was not necessary, because "I issue my own policies and adjust the losses."

(21) Q. Was the plaintiff at any time authorized by said defendant to mortgage or remortgage the said property covered by said insurance policy after the said insurance was issued and delivered to said plaintiff?

A. Yes.

(22) Q. If you answer question No. 21 in the affirmative, you will then please state at what time said authority was given, and by what officer or agent such authority was given, and whether such authority was given orally or in writing?

A. First, when application was made out; second, when policy was returned by Steinbuschel and brother, district agent.

Johnston, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The greater part of the testimony taken in the case was with reference to the extent and value of the property destroyed, and as to whether or not the fire was the result of the action of the insured. But these questions, as well as all others upon which there was a conflict of evidence, have been determined by the jury in favor of the insured. The Insurance Company now seeks to escape liability upon the ground that Gray failed to disclose the existence of incumbrances upon the property when he made the application for insurance, and also because he had incumbered the property after the policy was issued without the consent of the Company indorsed thereon, and in violation of its provisions. The application for insurance was made on December 2, 1885, to Steinbuschel & Bro., of Wichita, who were agents of the Company for that portion of the State in which the property was situated. They wrote the answers to the questions propounded to Gray, and the application contained the statement that the answers made were true. The application only mentions one mortgage, but Gray testifies that he stated his indebtedness and the incumbrances on his property to the agents fully and in detail, telling them that it would be necessary for him to mortgage and remortgage his property in the conduct of his business during the time for which the insurance was contracted. This is disputed; but the jury sustain Gray, and find that the Company was fully informed in respect to the existing incumbrances. The policy was not delivered by the agents at the time the application was made, but was sent by them to Gray at Conway Springs, Sumner County, near which place he resided. Soon after it had been so delivered, he discovered that it contained a provision that if the property should thereafter become mortgaged or incumbered, or, in case a change should take place in the title, the policy should be null and void. He immediately went to the agent, called his attention to the provision prohibiting the incumbering of his property, and insisted that it must be changed. After looking at the policy, Steinbuschel said that he would waive the condition relative to incumbrances, stating that he had authority for that purpose, and Gray, acting upon this waiver and agreement, mortgaged the property, as has already been stated. The incumbrances placed on the property, however, were mostly, if not entirely, the renewal and extension of debts and mortgages existing when the contract of insurance was made.

In regard to the misrepresentations in the application, we must assume that Gray gave correct answers to all questions asked. There was no concealment nor deception on his part. Steinbuschel, authorized by and acting for the Company, prepared the application, and purposely omitted a fuller statement concerning incumbrances. It was the fault of Steinbuschel or the Company which he represented, and not of the insured, that the application did not contain a complete statement. Steinbuschel having authority, his act must be treated as the act of the Company, and through him the Company had knowledge of all the incumbrances. With this knowledge, the Company accepted the risk, and the premium therefor, induced Gray to sign the application, which did not state the whole truth, and now, when the loss occurs, they cannot, under our decisions, insist on the breach of warranty or the untruth of the representations. Sullivan v. Phenix Ins. Co. 24 Kan. 170. Continental Ins. Co. v. Purser, 20 Kan. 306; National Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Barnes, 41 Kan. 161; Kansas Protective Union v. Gardner, 41 Kan. 401.

It is next contended that the giving of the subsequent mortgages by the insured avoided the policy; and in that connection it is urged that error was committed in admitting testimony of the verbal agreement modifying the terms of the policy, and waiving its conditions. We think the waiver must be upheld, and the point made by the Company overruled. The agents who made the agreement were more than mere local or soliciting agents. They fully represented the Company within a certain district; were authorized to solicit insurance, receive moneys and premiums, issue and renew

An agreement by an insurance agent to note on the application the fact of an incumbrance on the property, upon which agreement the applicant relied, estops the company from setting up the incumbrance to defeat a recovery on the policy. Copeland v. Dwelling-House Ins. Co. (Mich.) Nov. 8, 1893.

But the company is not estopped from claiming the forfeiture where the local agent who issued the policy gave the insured to understand that such incumbrances would not invalidate the policy. Smith v. Continental Ins. Co. (Dak.) Oct. 10, 1893.

Where an insurance agent as a matter of fact was informed of the existence of mortgages on the property insured, and obtained a signature of the insured, who was ignorant in such matters, to an application which he had himself made out, the agent's knowledge of the existence of the mortgages was binding upon the company, and a waiver of the condition of the policy against such incumbrances. Bender v. Dwelling-House Ins. Co. 74 Wis. 42.

The knowledge of an agent, before the issue of an insurance policy, of the truth as to the ownership of the insured property and litigation concerning it, will prevent a defense on the ground of misrepresentations as to these matters in the application. Western Amer. Co. v. Stoddard, 28 Ala. 624.

Nor will such overestimates render proofs of loss insufficient as a written statement of loss to render the company liable. Ibid.

Where the loss was disputed by the company it was error to dismiss the complaint on the ground that the proofs of loss were insufficient. Karlson v. San Fire Office, 45 Hun, 144.

It is sufficient to declare that "the said fire did not originate by any act, design or procurement on his (the insured's) part, or in consequence of any fraud or evil practice done or suffered by him." Howard Ins. Co. v. Hooking, 6 Cent. Rep. 912, 116 Pa. 416.

In a suit upon a policy of fire insurance, where the defense is that the plaintiff fraudulently misrepresented his loss, the alleged fraud must arise out of and inhere in representations as to the personal property contained in the proof of loss and policies; and the testimony is that they appointed sub-agents and adjusted losses. Only a short time previous to the making of the contract in question, they adjusted a loss under another insurance policy issued by the same Company to Gray, and paid him the amount of the loss. Gray had a right to assume, and we may fairly assume, that they were general agents of the Company.

In this State the courts have taken a liberal view with reference to the power of agents, and especially where they were representing foreign companies, which can only act through their agents, and where the agent is practically the principal in the making of contracts. Am. Cent. Ins. Co. v. McLeanathan, 11 Kan. 649, and cases above cited.

Being general agents, empowered to make and renew contracts, they stood in this respect in the place of the Company, and certainly must be held to have the power to modify the same, or to waive any of the conditions in the contract which they had made. We are referred to Burlington Ins. Co. v. Gibbons (Kan.), 23 Pac. Rep. 1010, where the power of the agent to waive a condition was denied. In that case the agent had no authority from his company except as a soliciting agent, and it did not appear that he had any authority to issue policies, and he did not even countersign them when issued. In that case, however, it was said that "it has generally been held that where a person in procuring an insurance upon his property acts in good faith, and without any knowledge of any limitations upon the authority of the agent of the insurance company effecting the insurance, such person may assume that the agent is a general agent of the insurance company for that purpose; that he stands in the place of the company; and that the company will be bound by any terms or conditions or any waiver of terms or conditions which the agent may agree to while acting for the company in consummating the insurance."

If it was within the power of the Company, acting through its agents, to waive a condition or change the contract, it surely might do so by a parol contract, and might even waive the provisions stated in the policy with reference to the manner of altering or waiving its terms and conditions.

In Westchester F. Ins. Co. v. Barle, 30 Mich. 143, the court, in considering the question whether an agent of a company might change the conditions of a policy by parol, wherein it was provided that it could only be done upon the consent of the company written thereon, held that the written policy might be changed by parol, and stated that "a written bargain is of no higher legal degree than a parol one. Either may vary or discharge the other, and there can be no more force in an agreement in writing not to agree by parol than a parol agreement not to agree in writing. Every such agreement is ended by the new one which contradicts it." See also Elletts L. Ins. Co. v. Padenbrug, 30 Ill. 403.

In the present case, as in some of the cases cited, it was stipulated in the policy that no agent of the Company, or any other person other than the president and secretary, should have authority to alter or waive any of the terms of conditions of the policy, or make any indorsement thereon, and all agreements of the president or secretary must be signed by either of them. This provision, however, may be modified by the Company to the same extent as any other, and whatever the Company can do may be done by its general agents.

Ranger v. Dredging House Ins. Co., 74 Wis. 80, was a case somewhat similar to the one we are considering. In that case the policy provided that the application should form a part of the policy and a warranty by the assured. In the application for insurance it was stated that the property insured was not incumbered, but it appeared that the property was mortgaged, and that the insured informed the agent of the company of the existence of the mortgage, and he falsely wrote the answers therein, and the application was signed at the request of the agent. In the policy issued was a provision that "no act or omission of the company, or any act of its officers or agents, shall be deemed, construed or held to be a waiver of a full and strict compliance with the foregoing provisions of the terms and conditions of this policy, except it be a waiver or extension in express terms and in writing, signed by the president or secretary of the company." It was held that the action of the agent, with knowledge of the existence of the mortgage, was binding upon the company, and a waiver of the condition of the policy against incumbrances, and this, notwithstanding the limitation of authority of such agent expressed in the provision quoted on the face of the policy. Speaking of the restriction the court said: "We must hold, however, that such attempted restrictions upon the power of the company or its general officers or agents, acting within the scope of their general authority, to subsequently modify the contract and bind the company in a manner contrary to such previous conditions in the policy are ineffectual. Especially is this true in respect to a foreign insurance company whose officers are practically inaccessible to the assured."—citing Gene v. St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co. 45 Wis. 108; American L. Ins. Co. v. Galatin, 48 Wis. 86; Shaffer v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 60 Wis. 801; Lamberton v. Connecticut F. Ins. Co. 1 L. R. A. 293, 80 Minn. 120; *Willems v. Northwestern Mut. & Ins. The court, proceeding further, says: "Of course, an insurance company, and especially a foreign insurance company, in making contracts of insurance, and adjusting, settling and paying losses, must act through its agents, if at all. To hold that, in such negotiations between such general agents and the assured, the latter is bound, but that in the same transaction the company, the agent's principal, cannot be bound by reason of having incapacitated itself and them, by previous stipulations, from agreeing to anything contrary to the conditions contained in the original contract, is, under most policies, in effect to hold that there is no mutuality in such contracts, and that the powers of such general agents are limited to the obtaining of premiums, and then defeating the enforcement of the policies upon which they were paid."

It is clear that the Company was not so bound but that it might modify any contract which it had made, or waive any of the conditions contained therein, and this may be done through its general agents. The knowledge of Steinbuechel & Bro. in this case was the knowledge of the Company, and their act was its act. When Gray applied for the insurance he informed the Company with reference to the incumbrances, as well as his necessity and purpose to continue them. Knowing these facts, the premium was accepted and the policy issued. Subsequent to the issuance of the policy, there was an express agreement that he might renew his mortgages as he had informed the Company it would be necessary to do, and the renewal of the incumbrances did not in any material degree affect the risk which the Company took. Accepting his statement, as the jury have done, we must assume that he acted in good faith with the Company and its agents, and that he was induced by the agreements and action of the Company to believe that he was warranted in renewing the mortgages. After receiving and retaining the premium, knowing the purpose and necessity of Gray to renew the incumbrances, and after a specific agreement waiving that condition of the policy, and authorizing him to renew the incumbrances, and after remaining silent and allowing him to proceed as though he was insured, until a loss occurs, the Company will not be heard to repudiate its contract or to deny its liability. We are aware that the authorities are not uniform upon the subject of waivers in policies like this one, but forfeitures are not favored in the law, and the view we have taken of the power of a general agent to waive the condition of a policy is more satisfactory to us, and is sufficiently supported. In addition to the authorities already cited, see the following: Young v. Hartford F. Ins. Co., 45 Iowa, 371; King v. Council Bluffs Ins. Co., 79 Iowa, 210; Morrison v. North American Ins. Co., 69 Tex. 363; McGurk v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co., 1 L. R. A. 563, 56 Conn. 838; American Ins. Co. v. Gallatin, 48 Wis. 36; Bartlett v. Fireman's F. Ins. Co., 77 Iowa, 135; Ray v. Des Moines Ins. Co., 77 Iowa, 174; Street v. Odd Fellows Mut. Aid Assn., 117 Ind. 97; 2 Wood, Ins. §§ 429, 505.

It is further contended that a forfeiture occurred by reason of the failure of Gray to send proofs of loss to the Company. It is shown that immediately after the fire he notified Steinbuechel & Bro. of the loss, and they stated that they would at once inform the Company. Within a few days an adjuster of the Company, whose authority is not denied, came to Gray's place, and requested him to go before an officer and make proof of loss. The proofs were reduced to writing, signed and sworn to, and delivered to the adjuster; and there is testimony to the effect that he expressed satisfaction with them, and stated that he would forward them to the Company's office, and would return in a few days and settle the loss. This testimony was submitted to the jury under the following directions: "There is evidence tending to show that these statements were taken by said Winne as the agent of said Company, and sent to said Company, and it will be a question for the jury to determine whether such statements and proofs are such as are required by the policy, and, if not, whether the plaintiff was justified under the circumstances in believing, and did believe, that the proofs were satisfactory to the agent of the Company and to the Company, and that no further proofs would be required, and if the jury find from the evidence that the plaintiff was justified in believing, and did believe, that the proofs furnished to said Winne were satisfactory to him and to the Company; and further find that such proofs and statements were sent to the Company by said Winne, and that the Company made no objection thereto, and requested no further proofs to be made by the plaintiff within a reasonable time, and within the sixty days after the fire,—the jury would be justified in finding that defendant had waived the making of further proofs of loss. If, at the time such affidavits and statements were made at the request of said Winne, it was understood between said agent and said plaintiff that such statements and affidavits should not constitute the proofs required by the policy, and should not be considered as a waiver of such proofs, and that by taking such statements and affidavits said Winne should not and did not waive the making of the proofs in accordance with the provisions of the policy, then the jury would not be justified in finding that the taking of such statements and affidavits by said Winne, or that the acts and conduct of said Winne at the time of taking such statements and affidavits, constituted a waiver of the proofs required by the policy."

The testimony was sufficient to sustain the finding of the jury. Neither the adjuster nor anyone representing the Company returned the proofs, or claimed that they were insufficient. The Company recognized the loss, took all the proofs it deemed essential to an adjustment, and, instead of claiming that they were insufficient, expressed satisfaction with them, and stated that the loss would soon be paid. Assuming the existence of the facts stated, we think the assured had a right to assume, until notified to the contrary, that no other or different proofs would be required. There are some criticisms in regard to the refusal of the court to give instructions, but what has already been said in the opinion disposes of the material objections that are made. The charge of the court fairly submitted the questions involved to the jury.

Finding no error, the judgment of the District Court will be affirmed.

INSURANCE COMPANY OF NORTH AMERICA, of Philadelphia, App't.

Machinery and apparatus used in the business of manufacturing leather and morocco, including boiler, engine, etc., being the only property covered by a policy of insurance, do not constitute a mill, or the standing still thereof create a forfeiture under a policy which provides that "if a building covered by this policy shall become vacant or unoccupied, or if a mill or manufactory shall stand idle . . . all liability hereunder shall thereupon cease," where a further provision of the policy as to the falling of a building expressly declares that the policy shall cease as to property therein as well as to the building.

NOTE.—Fire insurance; forfeiture in case of vacancy or non-occupancy.

General agents of an insurance company in the matter of issuing policies may make a valid stipulation for the insertion of a clause in a policy relating to the occupancy of the buildings insured. Continental Ins. Co. v. Buckman, 127 Ill. 284.

And the insured will be presumed to have had knowledge of a provision in his policy that the policy shall be void in case of the property becoming vacant, unoccupied or uninhabited. Burlington Ins. Co. v. Gibbons (Kan.) Jan. 11, 1890.

The condition against non-occupancy, in an insurance policy, must be construed and applied in reference to the subject matter of the contract and the ordinary incidents attending the use of the insured property. Halpin v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 118 N. Y. 145; Whitney v. Black River Ins. Co. 73 N. Y. 117.

The written agreement on a policy as to the use and occupation of the premises must be construed as an express promissory warranty, in the nature of a condition precedent, and a literal compliance is essential to the right of recovery. *Dewees v. Such a condition does not render the policy absolutely void upon the happening of the event; and if the insurer waives the forfeiture, neither the insured nor a third person can treat the insurance as void. Germania F. Ins. Co. v. Klewer (Ill.) Oct. 31, 1890.

If the insurer does not exercise the power in case of breach of the condition, to declare the forfeiture while the assured is in default, and the premises are again occupied, its right to do so ceases, and its liability on the policy again attaches. *Insurance Co. of N. Terms "vacancy" and "non-occupancy" construed.

The terms "vacancy" and "non-occupancy" are used interchangeably in a policy which specially provides that "in case the premises shall be left unoccupied" (*Paine v. Agricultural Ins. Object of stipulation.

The object of the stipulation against vacancy and (Second-Department), affirming a judgment of the Kings Circuit entered upon a verdict directed for plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due upon a policy of fire insurance. Affirmed.

Statement by Vann, J.:

This is an action upon an insurance policy issued by the defendant on the 10th of February, 1883, whereby it insured the plaintiff, for the period of one year from that day, "against loss or damage by fire, to an amount not exceeding $3,000, on his boiler, steam-engine and connections, machines, machinery, shafting, belting, pulleys, hangers, tubs, tanks, tables, tools, vats and all machinery and apparatus used in the business of manufacturing leather and morocco, all contained in the frame building and extension situate on the south side of Wallabout Street, about 875 feet westerly from Lee Avenue, Brooklyn, L. I."

The defendant answered, alleging that after the delivery of the policy, and before the loss occurred, the plaintiff permitted "the said building in said policy mentioned to become vacant and unoccupied, and the said mill to remain idle, . . . until and at the time of the fire in" question. It appeared that the property insured was totally destroyed by fire on the 4th of January, 1884, and that for several months prior thereto the morocco factory had "stood idle," although the machinery was not removed from the building.

Mr. Thomas E. Pearsall for appellant.
Mr. Nathaniel C. Monk, with Mr. John Oakley, for respondent.

Vann, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

erty, others that apply only to personal property, and others, still, that are applicable to property of both kinds. The form was evidently designed for use in insuring both kinds together, or either kind separately; but in the latter case, of course, certain provisions were not intended to be operative, as there would be nothing for them to act upon. The only provision specifically pleaded by the defendant in its answer, as a defense to this action, is the following, viz.: "If a building covered by this policy shall become vacant or unoccupied, or if a mill or manufactory shall stand idle, or be run nights or overtime, without notice to and the consent of the company, clearly stated hereon, all liability hereunder will thereupon cease; and if a building shall fall, except as the result of a fire, this policy, if covering thereon, or on property therein, shall thereupon immediately cease and determine."

It is contended by the defendant that "the machinery covered by the policy constituted a mill, and that its standing idle created a forfeiture." On the other hand, the plaintiff claims that a building is the sole subject of insurance contemplated by the first part of the clause above quoted, and that its true meaning is that if a building covered by the policy shall become vacant or unoccupied, or if, being a mill or manufactory, it shall stand idle, all liability shall at once cease. The plaintiff further claims that the property insured was not a mill or manufactory, and that it was not insured as a mill or manufactory, but simply as personal property.

We think that the plaintiff is right in his contention, because it would not be a natural or ordinary use of language to describe machinery used in milling as a mill, or in manufacturing as a manufactory. Herrman v. Merchants Ins. Co. 51 N. Y. 184.

The property insured was neither a mill nor non-occupancy is to guard against the increased risk arising from the absence of everybody whose duty or interest might afford protection from fire. Moore v. Phoenix F. Ins. Co. 3 New Eng. Rep. 57, 64 W. H. 140.

So a home from which the owner or tenant has removed with no definite intention of returning is unoccupied or vacant. Sleeper v. New Hampshire F. Ins. Co. 34 N. H. 401; Hartshorne v. Agricultural Ins. Co. 18 Conn. Rep. 122, 40 N. J. L. 437.

But a temporary absence, or the occasional and necessary absence of the family or servants, will not be so construed. Phenix Ins. Co. v. Tucker, 92 Ill. 64; Lacelle v. Hoboken F. Ins. Co. 43 N. J. L. 400; O'Brien v. Commercial F. Ins. Co. 4 Jones & B. 517; Franklin F. Ins. Co. v. Kepner, 35 Pa. 433.

A building is not vacant, unoccupied or not in use although unoccupied except by a clerk who entered and made repairs, occupied and slept therein. Stensgaard v. National F. Ins. Co. 35 Minn. 101; Imperial F. Ins. Co. v. Kiernan, 22 Ky. 443; Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Smith, 3 Colo. 433.

But where the tenant with his family removes from the building, merely leaving some furniture therein, and resides elsewhere, the building is deemed unoccupied and vacant. Bennett v. Agricultural Ins. Co. 31 Conn. 304; Saxton v. Hawkeye Ins. Co. 30 Iowa, 39; Fosbe v. Council Bluffs Ins. Co. 74 Iowa, 470; Ashworth v. Builders Mut. F. Ins. Co. 115 Mass. 423; Corrigan v. Connecticut F. Ins. Co. 123 Mass. 235; Oook v. Continental Ins. Co. 70 Mo. 410; Watertown F. Ins. Co. v. Cherry, 51 Va. 32. 30 L. R. A.

Insurance on mill and machinery.

In a contract of insurance, made for a period of years upon a mill building and machinery, a description of the property as a "sawmill building" had not the effect to restrict the use to the purpose of a sawmill. Frost's D. L. & W. Works v. Millers & M. Mut. Ins. Co. 37 Minn. 331.

Where an engine driving planing-mill machinery twenty-two feet distant, and engine room and mill building were connected merely by a shaft transmitting power from the engine to the mill, and by a spout carrying shavings from mill to engine, while beneath these a roadway separated said buildings, insurance on such "mill building and addition and machinery thereon" covers such engine-room and contents. Home Mut. Ins. Co. v. Roe, 71 Wm. 33.

Clause excluding policy for non-occupancy and vacancy of premises.

To constitute occupancy of a building used for manufacturing purposes, within a clause in an insurance policy against non-occupancy, there must be some practical use or employment of the property. Malpin v. Phenix Ins. Co. 115 N. Y. 165.

But a building used as a manufactory, which is closed and in the hands of an agent to rent, is unoccupied, within a provision in an insurance policy against non-occupancy, although occasionally visited by the agent and a watchman who resides next door. 184d.

A cotton-mill building is not vacant and unoccupied within a policy, where a number of ema manufactory, as those words are commonly understood. While the word "mill" is used to describe "a machine for grinding," it is also defined as "a building, with its machinery, where grinding, or some process of manufacturing, is carried on." Webster Dict.

A manufactory is "a house or place where anything is manufactured." Ibid.

Neither term would be understood or used by the mass of mankind to describe simply "machinery and apparatus used in the business of manufacturing leather and morocco," which is the description in the written part of the policy that is claimed to mean a mill or manufactory as used in the printed part. If the defendant intended to attach the condition in question to machinery used in a mill, it should have said so. In the condition relating to the fall of a building it is provided that "this policy, if covering thereon, or on property therein, shall thereupon immediately cease." So the clause prohibiting the use of certain inflammable substances provides that if they are "stored, kept or used in any building on which, or on the contents of which, there is any insurance," the policy shall be void.

Thus it appears that in certain instances, by the use of language that no one could mistake, the insurer made its intent clear that a certain condition should apply both to real and personal property. If it intended that the condition under consideration should thus apply, why did it not say so? We think that this condition refers to a mill or manufactory in the sense only of a building used for milling or manufacturing, and that it has no application to the personal property covered by the policy.

Moreover, if there is a reasonable doubt as to the meaning or application of this clause, it should be construed most favorably to the insured, because the insurer prepared and executed the contract, and is responsible for the language used. Kratzenstein v. Western Assur. Co. 116 N. Y. 54, 59; Dillehor v. Home L. Ins. Co. 90 N. Y. 256, 253.

As was said by this court in a recent case: "The defendant is claiming a forfeiture. When a clause in a contract is capable of two constructions, one of which will support, and the other defeat, the principal obligation, the former will be preferred. Forfeitures are not favored, and the party claiming a forfeiture will not be permitted, upon equivocal or doubtful clauses or words contained in his own contract, to deprive the other party of the benefit of the right or indemnity for which he contracted." Baley v. Homestead F. Ins. Co. 80 N. Y. 31, 32.

The learned counsel for the defendant has referred us to a case, recently decided by this court, in which the plaintiff sought to recover for a loss upon the building that contained the personal property involved in this action, and destroyed by the same fire. Halpin v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 118 N. Y. 165.

The policy in that case covered the building only, and provided that if said building should become vacant or unoccupied the insurance should cease. We gave effect to that condition, which was clear and unequivocal, by reversing the judgment that the plaintiff had recovered. In another case arising out of the same fire, and decided during the present term, the policy covered personal property only, described as contained in said building; but it provided that "if the above-mentioned premises," referring to the building, should become vacant or unoccupied, the policy should be void. Halpin v. Atlas F. Ins. Co. 80 N. Y. St. Rep. 250.

In that case, also, we were required by the clear and unmistakable terms of the contract, and the facts as disclosed by the evidence, to ply the are retained in the service of lessee, and are actually engaged about their usual work in the mill up to and on the day of the fire, and all the plant and some material and manufactured goods are there. American F. Ins. Co. v. Brighton Cotton Mfg. Co. 16 West. Rep. 180, 135 Ill. 131.

Where, during repairs of machinery by a manufacturing company, watchmen were on duty and employes were about the factory from its closing until it burned, it is not unoccupied. Brighton Mfg. Co. v. Reading F. Ins. Co. 25 Fed. Rep. 222; Brighton Mfg. Co. v. Fire Assn. of Phila. Id. 204; Lebanon Mut. Ins. Co. v. Leathers (Pa.) 8 Cent. Rep. 301.

Provisions against ceasing to operate mill or machinery.

Provision against ceasing to operate a tannery will not be violated, if at the time of the fire the use of the premises is the same as at the time of insurance. Lebanon Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Erb, 3 Cent. Rep. 703, 112 Pa. 149.

The temporary suspension of the operation of a steam engine in a planing mill, materially decreasing the risk, the other business continuing, does not avoid a policy conditioned to be void on suspending operations without a special agreement indorsed on the policy. Allemanis F. Ins. Co. v. White (Pa.) 10 Cent. Rep. 65.

But a building insured as a trip-hammer shop, the business therein suspended for more than thirty days, the machinery and tools remaining there and the plaintiff's son going through the shop nearly every day to see if things were right, did not constitute occupancy. Moore v. Phoenix F. Ins. Co. 3 New Eng. Rep. 57, 64 N. H. 140.

A temporary cessation of the operation of a manufactory, occasioned by the prevalence of an epidemic, is not a ceasing of operation. Pom v. Western Amur. Co. 7 Lea, 704.

A mere temporary suspension of business to make repairs, or for want of materials, is not a cessation of operation. Lebanon Mut. Ins. Co. v. Leathers (Pa.) 8 Cent. Rep. 301.

A sawmill lying idle for several weeks for lack of water or want of logs does not thereby cease to be occupied. Whitney v. Black River Ins. Co. 39 N. Y. 117.

The stoppage of a mill, though for the purpose of necessary repairs, without the required notice, is within the provision of a policy that, if the mill shall be shut down or remain idle from any cause whatever, the policy shall be considered suspended until work resumed. Day v. Mill-Owners Mut. F. Ins. Co. 70 Iowa, 710.

A temporary suspension of the operation of a mill for forty-two days, occasioned solely by the want of logs to manufacture, while the logs were expected daily, does not make the policy void, under a provision that if the mill shall cease to be operated, unless shut down for repairs without notice to and consent of the company, it shall be void. City F. & S. Mill Co. v. Merchants M. & C. Mut. F. Ins. Co. (Mich.) Nov. 22, 1893.

reverse the judgment that had been rendered in favor of the plaintiff. But we are called upon in the case at bar to enforce a contract that differs materially from either of the others named, because it fails to attach any condition that was shown to have been violated, to the property covered by the policy.

The judgment in this case, therefore, should be affirmed.

All concur.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS

John W. SMITH and Wife

v.

COUNTY COURT OF KANAWHA
COUNTY, P_l. in Err.

(... W. Va.)

The plaintiff and a lady friend were driving a single horse, in a spring wagon, along the road leading from the City of Charleston to the Town of Malden, in Kanawha County. At a point in said road where it was from twelve to eighteen feet wide, two calves yoked together came suddenly from the pawpaw bushes, and frightened the horse, which the plaintiff had owned for two years, and regarded as gentle; and he commenced backing, and continued so to do until he backed the wagon and its occupants and himself over the steep river bank, whereby the plaintiff was seriously and permanently injured. In a suit brought by said plaintiff against the County Court of Kanawha County to recover damages for the injuries sustained, it was proven by plaintiff that she could have managed the horse but for the narrowness of the road; that she had traveled the same road two or three times a week for the previous two years without accident,—and by another witness that the road was in good condition, smooth and cindered, and that he had traveled said road two hundred times a year for sixteen years, driving all kinds of horses and teams, and had never met with an accident; that the road at that point was wide enough for two teams to pass, and on one side of the road was a steep mountain which slipped into the road in wet times, and on the other side the river bank. Held, that under the circumstances of this case, the defendant was not liable for said injury.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Kanawha County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from a defect in a public highway. Reversed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Messrs. Okay Johnson and S. C. Burdett, with Messrs. Sylvester Chapman and A. B. Littlepage, for plaintiff in error.

The County is not required to make the traveled part of the highway the whole width of the road as laid out, and will not be liable for defects in that part not usually traveled upon which do not affect the safety of the other part.

NOTE.—Negligence; Liability for injuries produced by.

One who violates a duty owed to others, or who commits a tortious or wrongfully negligent act, is liable not only for those injuries which are the direct and immediate consequences of his act, but for such consequential injuries as, according to common experience, are likely to and do in fact result from his act. McDonald v. Snelling, 14 Allen, 290; Metallic C. C. Co. v. Fitchburg R. Co. 109 Mass. 277; Derry v. Fittner, 118 Mass. 121; Wellington v. Downer Kerosene Oil Co. 104 Mass. 84; Sethurst v. Independent Congregational Church, 2 L. R. A. 496, 148 Mass. 261.

The resulting injury must be the natural and probable consequence of the original tortious or negligent act. See note to Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Lucas (Ind.) 6 L. R. A. 194.

A carrier's act, from which an injury results, will be deemed the proximate cause, unless the consequences were so unnatural and unusual that they could not have been foreseen and provided against by the highest practicable care, although the precise accident which occurred might not have been anticipated. See Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Lucas, 6 L. R. A. 194, 119 Ind. 609.

Negligence is the commission of a lawful act in a careless manner, or the omission to perform a legal duty, to the injury of another. Spittorf v. State, 10 Cent. Rep. 609, 108 N. Y. 205; Lahigh & W. Coal Co. v. Lear (Pa.) 6 Cent. Rep. 109.

The basis of liability in negligence is the violation of some legal duty to exercise care. Culick v. Adams, 118 N. Y. 58.

The fact that an accident is unusual, unexpected or unheard of will not excuse the negligence which causes it. Doyle v. Chicago, St. P. & K. C. R. Co. 4 L. R. A. 493, 77 Iowa, 697.

The loss or injury attributed to the proximate cause.

There should be such affinity or connection in the relation of the cause and the effect, that the influence of the wrongful act should predominate over other supervening causes. Brown v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 2 West. Rep. 689, 20 Mo. App. 232; Gilliland v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 3 West. Rep. 126, 19 Mo. App. 411.

When there is no intermediate efficient cause, the original wrong must be considered as reaching to the effect and proximate to it. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 409 (34 L. ed. 256).

In all cases of loss it is to be attributed to the proximate cause, and not to the remote cause. This maxim governs in cases of insurance. Waters v. Merchants Louisville Ins. Co. 36 U. S. 11 Pet. 212 (9 L. ed. 601); West Mahanoy Twp. v. Watson, 8 Cent. Rep. 542, 116 Pa. 244.

If negligence is the proximate cause of the injury, it is of no consequence whether it be by omission or commission. Harriman v. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. 9 West. Rep. 448, 45 Ohio St. 11.

Negligence is not actionable unless it is the proximate cause of the injury complained of. Mathison v. Mayer, 7 West. Rep. 729, 80 Mo. 585; Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Conn. 1 West. Rep. 904, 104 Ind. 64; Carter v. Chambers, 79 Ala. 222.

Negligence in standing on the step of a car platform while the train is in motion is not the proximate cause of injury from a lever or signal of a switch which scraped the cars as they passed. Boss v. Northern Pac. R. Co. 5 Dak. 209.

The stoppage of a gas pipe is not the proximate cause of an accident, during an experiment made to increase the pressure. Taylor v. Baldwin, 79 Cal. 517.

Dickey v. Maine Tel. Co. 48 Me. 483; Phillips v. Ritchie Co. Ct. 81 W. Va. 481.

If the road was dangerous, and the female plaintiff knew it was dangerous, but she was willing to risk it if anybody else was, then the evidence shows no right to recover, because she ought not to have driven over it, and it was negligence in her to do so.

Phillips v. Ritchie Co. Ct. 81 W. Va. 477; Moore v. Huntington, Id. 843; Hubbard v. Conard, 35 N. H. 53; Raymond v. Lowell, 6 Cush. 634.

If the road was safe and good to the width of eleven to fifteen feet, and safe to pass, if the horse did not become frightened, and the cause of the injury was, not the narrowness of the road, but "the calves coming down from the hillside out of some pawpaw bushes," which frightened the horse and caused him to back over the bank, then she is not entitled to recover, because the fright to the horse by the calves was the cause of the accident, a cause that could in no sense be attributed to any fault or neglect of the County.

Kingsbury v. Dedham, 13 Allen, 180; Land v. Tyngsboro, 11 Cush. 563.

A county is not liable for every object which renders a public road unsafe and inconvenient for travelers to pass over it, but only for such as not only render the road unsafe and inconvenient, but also defective or out of repair, and the injury must be attributable to the defect or want of repair.

Coak v. Charlestown, 13 Allen, 190, note.

The duty of the County to the traveling public does not extend to the degree of keeping its road in such condition that no injury could possibly happen.

Wilson v. Charlestown, 8 Allen, 187.

Moore, Knight & Couch, with Mr. Sam D. Littlepage, for defendant in error:

The complaint is good in that it alleges that that particular road, at that particular point where the injury occurred, was in a bad condition and out of repair in point of narrowness, and that that resulted in the injury complained of.

Stone v. Hubbardston, 100 Mass. 49.

The mere fact that a traveler is familiar with the road, and knows of the existence of a defect therein, will not impose upon him the duty to use more than ordinary care in avoiding it.

Where two causes combine to produce an injury to a traveler upon a highway, both of which are in their nature proximate, the one being a culpable defect in the highway and the other some occurrence for which neither party is responsible, the municipality is liable, pro-

Where a person willfully turned a stream from a hose upon horses hitched in front of his premises and they ran away and collided with a wagon, he was liable for the injury. Forney v. Goldmacker, 73 Mo. 112.

In determining the proximity of cause the true rule is that the injury must be the natural and probable consequence of the negligence. West Mahanoy Twp. v. Watson, 3 Cent. Rep. 648, 116 Pa. 344; Southside Pass. R. Co. v. Trish, 10 Cent. Rep. 387, 117 Pa. 380.

The ascertainment of the dividing line between proximate and remote cause, in actions for damages for injuries by negligent use of highways by railroad trains, is so perplexing that to a sound judgment must be left each particular case, upon the special facts belonging to it. *Brown v. going to start or that it was in motion. Barkley v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 38 Mo. 387.

Where cattle stopped on a highway by a standing railroad train are injured by another train, the obstruction caused by the standing train is too remote a cause of injury to make the company liable. Brown v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. supra.

Damages resulting from fright or nervous shock to a person not actually struck, caused by the fall of a bundle of laths through the negligence of another person, are too remote to be recovered. Rock v. Denik (Super. Ct.) 4 Montreal L. Rep. 254.

English, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

An action of trespass on the case was brought to the February Rules, 1898, in the Circuit Court of Kanawha County, by John W. Smith and Leonora Smith, his wife, against the County Court of Kanawha County. On the 23d day of March, 1898, on the plaintiff's motion, the case was remanded to rules, with leave to them to amend their declaration, and on the 3d day of January, 1899, the defendant appeared by counsel, and demurred to the plaintiff's declaration, which demurrer, being argued by counsel, and considered by the court, was overruled, and thereupon the defendant pleaded not guilty, and issue was therein joined; and thereupon a trial was had before a jury, which resulted in a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for $750. The defendant then moved the court to set aside said verdict of the jury as being contrary to the law and the evidence, and award it a new trial, which motion the court, after consideration, overruled, to which action and ruling of the court the defendant excepted, and the court entered up judgment upon said verdict; and the defendant tendered a bill of exceptions to certain actions and rulings of the court, which was made a part of the record in the case; and the defendant applied for and obtained a writ of error and supercedens to said judgment.

The facts set forth in the bill of exceptions shows that the female plaintiff was driving a horse which she and her husband both regarded as gentle, returning home from Charleston in a spring wagon, accompanied by Miss Emma Jacob, along the road leading to her home in negligence of a stranger, is the direct and proximate cause of injury from a fall of the lumber pile. Pastore v. Adams, 49 Cal. 87.

the Town of Malden; that she had owned the horse for about two years, and had driven him from Malden to Charleston two or three times a week during that time, and had never known him to frighten, and that two calves came down from the hillside, out of the pawpaw lumber, and her horse became frightened, and commenced backing; that she tried to keep him in the road, but could not do so; that the horse backed until he backed across the road and over the river bank, a distance of about forty feet from the top of the river bank; that at the time her horse became frightened she was driving next to the mountain, on the side of the road furthest from the river; that she tried to keep the horse in the road, but he was so badly frightened she could not do so, although he was a gentle horse, easily managed, and had never become frightened before; that the road at that point was about from eleven to eighteen feet wide; that she received injuries from said accident of a serious and permanent character, and was under the treatment of a physician during the entire summer, that she was keeping a boarding-house in the Town of Malden, but had to give up the business on account of the injuries received, and since the accident had been unable to attend to her household affairs; that there was not room for two wagons to pass at the point where the accident occurred; that the road was in about the same condition it was during the two years she had been driving over it, that it looked dangerous; that said plaintiff had always considered it dangerous, but she was willing to risk it if anyone else was; that there was no other road by which she could return home; that she could have managed her horse had it not been for the narrowness of the road. This was, in substance, the testimony of the female plaintiff.

The testimony of J. W. Smith was, in substance, the same, fixing the width of the road, at the point where the accident occurred, at twelve feet, and stating that his wife is helpless now, unable to do any work, that she had to give up her boarding-house in Malden, and remain with him in Charleston, where his business is; that the road where the accident occurred, as far as it was made, was a good road, and the road was a favorite driving place between Charleston and Malden; that the slip from the mountain was not interfering with the road at the time of the accident, that he knew of.

J. E. Dana, a witness for the plaintiffs, proved that the road at that point was sixteen or eighteen feet wide; that the road was a favorite drive for pleasure; that he had driven along the road two hundred times a year for sixteen years, with all kinds of horses and teams, and had never met with an accident, and had never heard of one happening on said road; that the mountain on the upper side always slipped after a heavy rain, but the slips were always cleared away by parties in charge of the road, that the many slips had forced a curve in the road, throwing the road out close to the river bank; that the road was wide enough for two teams to pass, and that he, in driving, passed other teams at said point, and the road was as smooth as any road he had driven over in the County.

W. A. Bradford, a witness for plaintiffs, proved that he was well acquainted with the road at the point where the accident occurred; saw it next day after the accident; saw marks of the wagon wheel where it went over the bank; that the road was narrow at that point; that it was very difficult for two buggies to pass, but that they might, if they were careful; that he had known the road for forty years; that it had been narrow for five years; that it had been repaired, but not widened, and he thought it was a very dangerous place, but that there was plenty of room for one vehicle to pass in safety, if the horse did not become frightened, that there was a great deal of pleasure driving on that road.

Dr. Thomas, another witness for the plaintiffs, stated that, a short time before the trial of the cause commenced, he examined the plaintiff Mrs. J. W. Smith, and took a measurement of her left arm; that it was three fourths of an inch less in circumference than the right arm,—caused, in his opinion, by an injury.

These, in substance, constitute the facts proven by the plaintiffs; and, under the rulings of this court, we must, in considering the motion for a new trial, reject all of the evidence of the exceptor which is in conflict with that of the plaintiffs, and give full force and effect to the evidence of the plaintiffs. See Dowser v. Church, 21 W. Va. 22.

And the same rule must be applied in considering the propriety of the action of the court upon the motion to exclude the evidence of the plaintiffs. See Wandling v. Straw, 25 W. Va. 602, Franklin v. Geko, 30 W. Va. 27.

In determining the question as to whether the court erred in overruling the demurrer filed by the defendant in this case, it is only necessary to call attention to the fact that the demurrer was general, and counsel for the defendant do not insist that there was any defect in the second count. Neither is there any error apparent on the face of said second count, so far as we are able to discover, and, the second count being good, the demurrer, being general, was properly overruled. Nutter v. Spidenstricker, 11 W. Va. 536.

The serious question, however, which is presented by this case for our consideration and determination, is whether or not the court erred in refusing to exclude the evidence of the plaintiffs from the jury as being insufficient to maintain their suit, or in overruling the motion of the defendant to set aside the verdict of the jury as being contrary to the law and the evidence, and award it a new trial; and, as these rulings involve so nearly the same questions of law and fact, they may be considered together. What was it that caused the damage and injury to the female plaintiff on the day this accident is alleged to have occurred? Her own testimony shows that she had passed over this road two or three times a week for the preceding two years without injury. She was driving a horse that the evidence shows was gentle, and was driving him on the side of the road furthest from the river bank, and no doubt would have passed on as usual if the horse had not become frightened at the calves coming down from the hillside out of some pawpaw bushes, and commenced backing. That she tried to keep her horse in the road; but he was so badly frightened she could not do so, although he was gentle, easily managed and never had become frightened before. The witness Dana fixes the width of the road at that point at eighteen feet, and J. W. Smith at twelve feet. Dividing the difference between these witnesses would make the road fifteen feet. Then the plaintiff, driving at the edge of the road next the hill, was as far from the river bank as she would have been if the road had been thirty feet wide, and she had been driving in the middle of the same; and the horse would have to back the same distance to reach the river bank. In the absence of the calves, then, would the narrowness of the road have injured the plaintiff? This question is answered by the testimony of the witness Dana in detailing his experience for the previous sixteen years in passing over said road two hundred times a year, with all kinds of horses and teams, and without an accident, and also by the experience of the plaintiff herself, in passing over the same road for two years, two or three times a week, with this same horse; she encountered no calves on these many trips, and she met with no accident.

What, then, are we to conclude was the proximate cause of the accident? Was it the narrowness of the road? If such was the case, why had it not occurred many times before?

1 Sheerm. & Redf. Neg., § 26, says: "The breach of duty upon which an action is brought must be not only the cause, but the proximate cause, of the damage to the plaintiff. We adhere to this old form of words because while it may not have originally meant what is now intended, it is not immovably identified with any other meaning, and is the form which has been so long in use that its rejection would make nearly all reported cases on the question involved unintelligible. The proximate cause of an event must be understood to be that which, in a natural and continuous sequence, unbroken by any new cause, produces that event, and without which that event would not have occurred." And note 3 "If it cannot be said that the result would have inevitably occurred by reason of the defendant's negligence, it cannot be found that it did so occur, and plaintiff has not made out his case."

Applying this law to the facts of this case, can it be said the condition of the road was the proximate cause of the accident or injury complained of? If the use of this road, which had been for years in the same condition, without any accident resulting therefrom, had continued uninterrupted or unbroken by any new cause, such as the calves rushing from the bushes, would we be sanctioned in saying the injury would have resulted? Or can we say that, without the occurrence of that unlooked-for event, the horse would have backed the vehicle over the river bank? The experience of the plaintiff and others for years answers in the negative.

In the case of Singbury v. Dedham, 13 Allen 189, it was held that "an object is a highway with which a traveler does not come in contact or collision, and which is not shown to be an actual incumbrance or obstruction in the way of travel, is not to be deemed a defect for the sole reason that it is of a nature to cause a horse to take fright, in consequence of which he escapes from the control of his driver and causes damage." In this case the horse was frightened by a small pile of gravel in the road.

And in the case of Cook v. Charlestown, reported in a note (p. 190) of the same volume, a horse became frightened at another horse which had dropped dead, and was lying at the side of the street; and the frightened horse started and ran, and the carriage struck a tree and the carb-stone at a distance of about 180 feet, throwing the plaintiffs out, and injuring them. There was plenty of room for plaintiffs to pass without coming in contact with the dead horse. Under instructions authorizing them to do so, the jury found damages for the plaintiffs, and the defendant excepted, and the case was reversed upon a writ of error.

In the case of Titus v. Northbridge, 97 Mass. 265, the court holds "that when a horse, by reason of fright, disease or viciousness, becomes actually uncontrollable, so that his driver cannot stop him, or direct his course, or exercise or regain control over his movements, and in this condition comes upon a defect in a highway, or upon a place which is defective for want of a railing, by which the injury is occasioned, the town is not liable for the injury unless it appears that it would have occurred if the horse had not been so uncontrollable. But a horse is not to be considered uncontrollable that merely shies or starts, or is momentarily not controlled by his driver."

In the case of Horton v. Taunton, reported in a note [p. 200] to Titus v. Northbridge, supra, the facts were somewhat similar to the case under consideration: "A laborer employed by the city had deposited a load of stones within the limits of the highway, and near to, but wholly out of, the traveled portion of it, by the side of a reservoir. . . . The plaintiffs were driving from west to east, and had come within a few feet of these stones when their horse took fright at them, and suddenly began to back, and continued backing until he reached a point beyond the end of the railing west of the brook, and within the thirty-one feet where the bank was unprotected by a railing; and there he backed himself and the wagon over the bank, and the injuries were sustained for which this action was brought. The accident occurred, and all the damage was done, within the limits of the highway. The plaintiffs remained in the wagon, and retained hold of the reins, and used the ordinary means to control the horse and prevent the backing, but without success. Neither the horse nor the wagon came in contact with the stones, . . . nor would the accident have occurred if the horse had not been frightened; and it was agreed that 'the accident would not, probably, have occurred had the railing extended further westward,' and . . . that the want of a railing at the point where the horse backed over the bank was a defect in the highway, and had existed for many months." There was a judgment for plaintiffs in the court below. Chapman, J., delivering the opinion of the court, said: "This case was considered by the court in connection with Titus v. Northbridge, and the two cases must be governed by the same principle;" and, after briefly reviewing the facts, gave judgment for the defendants.

In the case of Jackson v. Ballouin, 80 Wis. 251, the court held as follows: "It is not the duty of towns to provide roads which shall be safe for runaway or unmanageable horses, or such as have escaped from control of their drivers without the fault of the town; and where injuries are sustained under such circumstances, it appearing that otherwise they might not have been sustained, the loss must fall upon the owners. See also Pegg v. Noland, 80 Mass. 578, where a carriage was upset by a

The plaintiff, Mrs. Smith, stated that "she tried to keep her horse in the road, but he was so badly frightened she could not do so." She does not, however, state what she did in trying to keep her horse in the road. Jennie Jones, however, the witness for defendant, who swears that she was driving the calves, does tell what Mrs. Smith did, and her evidence cannot be regarded as conflicting with any evidence offered by the plaintiffs, for no other witness tells what Mrs. Smith did. She says: "I was driving two calves, and just as they came up to the horse the horse got scared at the calves, and commenced backing; and Mrs. Smith, who was driving, commenced pulling on the lines, and the horse kept on backing, and the wagon and all went over the bank."

Mrs. Smith was in a situation that would have a tendency to excite a lady. The horse was frightened and backing, and the wagon was near the edge of the bank, which the witnesses speak of as being dangerous; and she may not have preserved that coolness which would enable her to properly manage a horse, although she was accustomed to driving. And pulling on the lines, under all the circumstances, would have a direct tendency to contribute to the result. She, however, says that she could have managed her horse had it not been for the narrowness of the road. This is her opinion; but the horse kept backing, till not only the wagon and occupants, but he, went over the bank after them.

Upon this question, as to the width a county road is required to be maintained and kept in order, it is true our Statute requires that "every road shall be thirty feet wide, unless the county court order it to be of a different width." The order establishing this road does not appear as a part of the record, and it does not appear whether it was ordered to be of a different width or not.

Ang. & D. Highw. § 200, says: "It is not required that towns—at least in the country—should incur the expense of having the whole width of a highway of two or four rods passable safely with wheels on the sides, or even a double track for wheels over all public roads including causeways and bridges. But if the town suffers the traveled part to become widened, or a turnout to exist from the traveled part to a private way over adjoining land with the characteristic marks of a highway, it is bound to keep such places, within the limits of the laying out of the highway, in suitable repair for travel usually passing,"—referring to Kelley v. Glover, 15 Vt. 708, Green v. Dandy, 18 Vt. 238; Cobb v. Standish, 14 Me. 198, and others. He says further: "In many cases, as has been remarked, all the property of the town would be insufficient for that purpose. There may be ledges of rocks, ravines and watercourses in the road; and towns are not expected, in all cases, to bridge the whole width of the road, to fill up ravines or cut down ledges of rock. The most that could be required, in a road so difficult by nature, is that the sides should be in such a state as would admit of the passing of carriages when they meet without unusual delay or trouble. 'If a road,' says Woodbury J., in the case of Hull v. Richmond, 2 Woodb. & M. 227, 'was on a steep mountain side, or was carried up from the bed of a stream against a steep cliff of rocks, or through a narrow notch or gorge among the hills, a double track would seldom be expected, though places should be made, at no great distance, for persons to turn out entirely, and others where, by each turning out in part, each could safely pass,' etc.

In the case of Dickey v. Maine Trolley Co. 40 Me. 483, the court held that "the law does not require the town, in preparing a highway for travel, ordinarily, to make the traveled path the whole width of the road. Towns are not liable for obstructions on the portions of a highway not constituting the traveled path, and not so connected with it as to affect the traveled portion."

In this case, it is evident the road was a difficult one to keep in proper order. On the one side was the steep river bank, and on the other the hillside, which slipped and encroached upon the road in wet weather; but, notwithstanding these facts, the evidence is that the road was in passable condition, and was wide enough for two teams to pass. All that the road surveyor, under our Statute, is required to do, is that "he shall superintend the county roads and bridges, cause the same to be put in good order and repair, of the proper width, well drained, and to be cleared, and kept clear, of rocks, falling timber, landslides, carcasses of dead animals and other obstructions, and remove all dead timber standing within thirty feet thereof." Code 1897, chap. 48, § 7.

The only one of these requirements which it is claimed was not complied with is the one in regard to the width of the road; and the authorities to which we have referred seem clearly to indicate that this requirement is not always to be complied with, but depends upon the character of the country over which the road is laid out; and, for a road located as this one was, with a steep river bank on one side and a slipping hillside on the other, we think the evidence shows it was in as good condition as could be expected.

Counsel for the defendant in error quote from 2 Shearm. & Redf. Neg., § 346, as follows: "The general rule is that where two causes combine to produce an injury to a traveler upon a highway, both of which are in their nature proximate,—the one being a culpable defect in the highway and the other some occurrence for which neither party is responsible,—the municipality is liable, provided the injury would not have been sustained but for such defect,"—and quote numerous decisions to sustain said proposition. We do not controvert this proposition; but, under the evidence adduced in this case, we hold that the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury was the sudden appearance of the calves from the paw-paw bushes, which frightened the horse, and without which the injury to plaintiff would not have resulted; that the narrowness of the road must be regarded as the remote cause, although the plaintiff says "she could have managed the horse had it not been for the narrowness of the road."

There would, however, have been no necessity for managing the horse if the calves had not frightened him. Without that extraneous occurrence, we feel confident the plaintiff would have passed along the road as usual. There was no defect in the road that caused the action of the horse, no hole in the ground left by the supervisor, or pile of stone or lumber placed there by him, that caused the backing, as there was in many of the cases reported. The plaintiff gives it as her opinion that she could have managed the horse but for the narrowness; but can we say, from all the circumstances, the horse would not have backed over the bank if the road had been thirty feet wide? He showed no indication of ceasing to back, but kept on after the wheels went over, and until he went over himself; and I cannot say the result would not have been the same if the road had been thirty feet wide.

In the case of Phillips v. Ritchie County Court, 31 W. Va. 478, this court held that where the defect or obstruction in the road is merely a remote cause of the injury, and the want of care or negligence of the plaintiff is the direct or proximate cause of the injury, the plaintiff cannot recover.

In the case of Fawcett v. Pittsburg, C. & St. L. R. Co., 34 W. Va. 755, this court held that "the cause of an injury, in contemplation of law, is that which immediately produces it as its natural consequence, and therefore, if a party be guilty of a default or act of negligence which would naturally produce an injury to another, but, before such injury actually results, a third person does some act which is the immediate cause of the injury, such third person is alone responsible for the injury." See also the case of Washington v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 17 W. Va. 190.

In that case, Judge Green, delivering the opinion of the court, quotes from the case of Louisiana Nat. Ins. Co. v. Tread, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 52 [19 L. ed. 87], from the opinion of Justice Miller, as follows: "One of the most valuable criteria furnished us by these authorities is to ascertain whether any new cause has intervened between the fact accomplished and the alleged cause. If a new force or power has intervened, of itself sufficient to stand as the cause of the misfortune, the other must be considered as too remote."

In my view of the case, neither the instructions asked for by the plaintiff nor defendant were relevant, and they should have been rejected. Disregarding, then, the testimony offered by the defendant, and looking only to the testimony of the plaintiffs for the facts and circumstances of the case, and applying the law thereto, the judgment of the Circuit Court must be reversed, and the case remanded; and a new trial is awarded the appellant.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

Andrew M. MILLER, Appt.,Luther MENDENHALL, Respnt.

(....Minn....)

*1. The State holds the title to the soil in navigable waters to low-water mark in trust for the people, and chiefly for the protection of the right of navigation.

2. The riparian owner is entitled to fill in and make improvements in the shallow waters in front of his land to the line of navigability, and such improvements in aid of navigation are recognized as a public as well as private benefit. These rights pertain to the use and occupancy of the soil below low-water mark, and are valuable property rights, and the exercise thereof, though subject to state regulation, can only be interfered with by the State for public purposes.

3. The establishment of a dock or harbor line in pursuance of legislative authority is to be considered as giving to the owners of the upland the privilege of filling in and building out to such line.

4. Where the owners of upland, bordering upon the Bay of Superior, in this State, after the establishment of the dock line, adopted a survey and plan of improvement for the use and occupation to such line of the submerged land abutting of the upland owned by them, in connection with the navigation of the lake,—Held, that they might not only possess, occupy and improve the same themselves, in connection with the dry land, but might concede to other parties the same rights within the dock line, and might, by the appropriate covenants and stipulations in the deeds to their grantees of the upland, and of sites used or to be used and improved under low-water mark, obligate each and all to respect and recognize the validity of such grants made in conformity with the general plan of improvement of the premises within the dock line, all such grantees thus becoming a party thereto; and in such case a court of equity will not interpose in favor of a grantee of the upland to set aside prior deeds to grantees of sites in the submerged land.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the District Court for St. Louis County sustaining a demurrer to the complaint in an action to have a conveyance of certain land covered by the waters of Duluth Harbor declared of no effect and to remove the alleged cloud thereby cast on plaintiff's title. Affirmed.

The facts fully appear in the opinion.

All the soil below high-water mark, within the limits of the State, where the tide ebbs and flows, that is the subject of exclusive property and ownership, belongs to the State, subject only to such lawful grants of such soil as may have heretofore been made. Hess v. Muir, 5 Cent. Rep. 585, 85 Md. 611.

In England only tide-waters were regarded as navigable. This rule has been adopted in many of the States of this country; and in them the public title to beds and shores of navigable streams is confined to tide-waters. Barney v. Keokuk, supra.

Since the decision in The Genesee (Chief, in 1851 (33 U. S. 12 How. 443, 13 L. ed. 1035), declaring all the great lakes and rivers of the country navigable that are really such, there is no longer any reason for thus restricting the title of the State except as a change might interfere with vested rights and established rules of property. Ibid.

In Iowa the true rule has been adopted, and it is held that the bed of the Mississippi River and its banks to high-water mark belong to the State, and that the title of a riparian proprietor extends only to that line. Ibid.; Hanwick v. Davenport & N. W. R. Co. 49 Iowa, 664.

This rule applies to land bounded upon the river generally. Barney v. Keokuk, supra.

Public authorities have the right, in Iowa, to build wharves and levees on the bank of the Mississippi below high-water mark,—the title below that line being in the State,—and make other improvements thereon necessary to navigation or public passage by railroads or otherwise, without thority of the Legislature, cannot be regarded as in any way operating as a conveyance from the State to the riparian proprietor of any title, interest or estate in the space between the shore and the dock line as established. The title to the bank and that to the submerged land remain precisely as they were before the dock line was established.

This case falls within the ruling of this court in Lake Superior Land Co. v. Emerson, 38 Minn. 406, which holds that the riparian right belonging to the owner of the shore is a mere natural right. It exists jure nature. It is a right incident to the use of land. It follows the ownership and use of the bank and cannot be severed from the abutting land.

For these reasons a deed of conveyance by the owner of the shore, of the submerged land in front of his premises, is inoperative. It passes no estate or interest in land.

Vanderburgh, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case involves the consideration of the riparian rights of the owners of lands abutting upon the Duluth Harbor or Bay of Superior, in the shoals or land covered by water between low-water mark and the deep or navigable waters, and within the dock or harbor line established by the authority of the Legislature. These waters are within the jurisdiction of the state and federal governments, and the State holds the title to low-water mark in its sovereign capacity, in trust for the people, for the purpose chiefly of protecting the rights of navigation. But, though the title is nominally in the State, the common right of the people is limited to what is of public use for the purposes of navigation and fishery; and the riparian owners are permitted to enjoy the remaining rights and privileges in the soil under water beyond their strict boundary lines, after conceding to the State all the public rights. Gould, Waters, § 168.

The right of access and communication with the navigable waters, which pertain peculiarly to the ownership of the upland, in order to be available and of practical use, necessarily includes the right to fill in and to build wharves and other structures in the shallow water in front of such land, and below low-water mark, and the exercise of such rights, though subject to state regulation, can only be interfered with for public purposes; and such improvements are encouraged, because they are in the general

Right to construct piers, wharves, etc.

Piers or landing places, and even wharves, may be private or public, although the property may be in an individual owner. Dutton v. Strong, 22 U. S. 1 Black, 22 (17 L. ed. 221).

The owner may have the right to their exclusive enjoyment, and may construct them for his own exclusive use or benefit. Ibid.

His right is property of which the owner can be deprived only if necessary that it be taken for the public good, upon due compensation. Yates v. Milwaukee, 17 U. S. 10 Wall. 497 (19 L. ed. 684).

But if erected without other authority than his mere ownership, the structures are unlawful and he will be liable for damages caused thereby. Atlee v. Northwestern Union Packet Co. 22 U. S. 22 Wall. 229 (22 L. ed. 619).

Wharves and permanent piers constructed by the riparian proprietor on the shores of navigable rivers, bays and arms of the sea, or on the lakes, where they do not extend below low-water mark, are not a nuisance, unless they are an obstruction to navigation. Dutton v. Strong, supra.

Such structures differ materially from wharves or piers made to aid navigation, and regulated by city or town ordinances, or by statutes or other competent authority, and from piers built for railroad bridges across navigable streams, which are authorized by Acts of Congress or statutes of the States. Atlee v. Northwestern Union Packet Co. supra.

A railroad company under the power of eminent domain, granted by the State, cannot appropriate his pier to its own use without compensating him. Davenport & N. W. R. Co. v. Bonwick, 22 U. S. 129 (20 L. ed. 51).

Right subject to control.

The State of California did not, by granting the use of the water front to the City of San Francisco, surrender control of the navigable waters of the interest of navigation and commerce, and are a public as well as a private benefit.

In Dutton v. Strong, 66 U. S. 1 Black, 33 [17 L. ed. 22], it is said that, "wherever the water is too shoal to be navigable, there is the same necessity for such erections for lake navigation as in the bays and arms of the sea; and where that necessity exists it is difficult to see any reason for denying to the adjacent owner the right to supply it."

And in Yates v. Milwaukee, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 497 [19 L. ed. 984], it is held broadly that these riparian privileges are to be treated as valuable property rights, which cannot be taken or interfered with for public use without compensation. Union Depot, S. R. & Transfer Co. v. Brunswick, 81 Minn 201.

And, if a stranger makes a filling or an obstruction in the waters in front of his land, the owner of the adjacent upland may enjoin its continuance, or recover in trespass, if not in ejectment.

In the case before us the complaint shows that a corporation known as the "Duluth Improvement Company" was the owner of a large tract of land bordering upon the waters of Duluth Harbor, which communicates with Lake Superior, and is navigable for large boats and vessels. In front of this land, and for a considerable distance into the bay, the water is shallow, and not navigable; and, in pursuance of legislative authority, a dock or harbor line had been duly established by the City of Duluth, extending in front of, and at a distance of a thousand feet or more from, the low-water mark on the tract of land referred to. Thereafter the Improvement Company caused this land, together with the land in front thereof under water, out to the dock line, to be surveyed and platted into lots and blocks, piers, slips, avenues and streets, and caused a plat thereof to be duly made and recorded under the name of the "Bay Front Division of Duluth," and thereafter proceeded to convey divers lots and parcels of the platted land, as well land under water as the dry land, to divers persons, by reference to the recorded plat, and by conveyances of the form set out in the complaint, and containing special covenants and stipulations, as hereinafter mentioned. The complaint further proceeds as follows: "That on or about the 27th day of June, 1887, the said Duluth Improvement Company sold and conveyed to Luther Mendenhall, defendant herein, by deed duly executed, a copy whereof is hereto annexed and made a part of this complaint, the following described tract or parcel of land, the same being a part of the land heretofore referred to, to wit: All that part of block twenty-seven (27) in the Bay Front Division of Duluth, first re arrangement, according to the recorded plat thereof, that lies easterly of a bay and the right to erect proper wharves and use them. Payne v. English, 79 Cal. 540.

A State Legislature may authorize the building of a bridge or other structure tending to obstruct the navigation of a navigable river which is altogether within its own boundary; and it is only when Congress, by virtue of the constitutional provision, acts as to such obstructions, that its will must be obeyed so far as may be necessary to insure free navigation. *Green & B. Be through said block, parallel with and at equal distances from the lines dividing said block from block twenty-six (26), and from block twenty-eight (28) in said division. That said Duluth Improvement Company, on or about the 30th day of July, 1887, sold and conveyed to plaintiff, by deed duly executed, and identical in form with and containing the same covenants as the deed to Luther Mendenhall, hereinabove referred to, the following described tract or parcel of land, being a part of the land hereinabove referred to, to wit: All that part of block twenty-seven (27) in the Bay Front Division of Duluth, first re-arrangement, according to the recorded plat thereof, that lies westerly of a line through said block parallel with and at equal distances from the lines dividing said block from block twenty-six (26), and from block twenty-eight (28), in said division, saving and excepting so much of said tract as lies within one hundred (100) feet of the southerly boundary line thereof, which said property so excepted is hereby dedicated for the perpetual use of a slip or water way for the use and benefit of the owners and occupants of property abutting thereon. Plaintiff further alleges that the greater part of said block 27, so as aforesaid conveyed to plaintiff by the Duluth Improvement Company, consisted of dry land and shore, and that the same extended to the low-water mark on said bay. That all of that part of said block 27, so as aforesaid conveyed to Luther Mendenhall by said Duluth Improvement Company, lies under the water of the bay, beyond the low water mark of said bay, and in front of and between that part of said block 27 so as aforesaid conveyed to plaintiff, and said established dock or wharf line upon said Duluth Harbor. That the said Luther Mendenhall claims title to the part of said block 27 so as aforesaid conveyed to him by the Duluth Improvement Company under and by virtue of said deed of conveyance to him, and claims the right to cut off and exclude plaintiff from access to the navigable waters of said bay over and across his part of that block, and denies the right of the plaintiff to dock out or make improvements in front of his part of the block to the established dock line, and claims and asserts that all the riparian rights to which plaintiff would be entitled, as owner of the shore along said harbor, are absolutely cut off and limited by the conveyance so as aforesaid made to him, said Mendenhall, as also by the conveyance made to the plaintiff."

Following the descriptions in the deeds to these parties, and to other grantees of the platted lands above referred to, we find the following clauses, covenants and stipulations, viz.: "Together with all the hereditaments thereunto belonging, or in anywise appertaining, but subject, nevertheless, to the reservations, exceptions and conditions of this instrument. And the said party of the first part, for himself, his successors and assigns, does covenant with the said party of the second part, his heirs and assigns, that it has not made, done, executed or suffered any act or thing whatsoever, whereby the above-described premises, or any part thereof, now are, or at any time hereafter shall or may become, imperiled, charged or incumbered in any manner whatsoever, and the title to the above-granted premises, against all persons lawfully claiming the same from or under it, the said party of the first part will forever warrant and defend. It being the intention hereby to vest in the said party of the second part, his heirs and assigns, forever, the exclusive right to use, occupy and enjoy the space covered by the above-mentioned lots, as laid down upon the said recorded plat of said Bay Front Division of Duluth, first re-arrangement, and to estop the party of the first part, his successors and assigns, from having or claiming the use or occupancy of said space by virtue of riparian ownership or otherwise. This conveyance is and shall be construed as a contract between the parties hereto. The character and extent of the premises, and the rights and privileges thereunto appertaining, whether riparian or other rights, shall be determined solely by reference to the plat of said division, and no rights or privileges of any kind shall pass by this conveyance except such as said plat shows to be appurtenant to the premises herein conveyed. The said party of the second part thereby estops himself, his heirs and assigns, from asserting or claiming that the lots or blocks, if any are shown on said plat, between the premises herein conveyed and the established dock line along the northerly side of the Bay or Harbor of Duluth, are not land, and estops himself from claiming or asserting any rights or privileges under this grant in any part of the territory covered by said plat, except such as would solely by reference to said plat vest in him."

The case comes here upon appeal from an order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint. In connection with the general statement in respect to the rights of riparian owners already made, we are to consider the additional fact of the establishment of the dock or harbor line, and the effect of the restrictive covenants in the deeds to the respective parties. The court will take notice of the extensive commerce and great shipping interests which must be accommodated in the Duluth Harbor, and which will require corresponding facilities in the way of local improvements, which must be made in great measure by private enterprise; and in this case we may assume that the plan adopted by the Duluth Improvement Company, in the survey and plat of the submerged land in connection with the upland, was one which was suitable and proper for the improvement and occupation of the same in the interests of navigation, so as to subserve the public as well as private interests. The action of the State, through the Legislature, in establishing the dock lines, is to be construed in connection with the established doctrine of riparian rights of which we have spoken, and the practical use permitted and necessarily made by riparian owners of land under water in front of the dry or upland.

In Adorn v. Smith, 19 R. I. 373, it is said by the court that the owners of the upland are in such cases impliedly permitted to carry the upland forward to the harbor line, so that each owner will occupy the part abrest his own land.

In Orford v. Seaboard River Bridge Comrs., 15 R. I. 234, 3 New Eng. Rep. 619, and in Eggs v. Furbush, 11 R. I. 223, 234, it is held to be a permission and invitation by the State to the riparian owner to fill out and incorporate the flats with his upland to the line. Eddridge v. Cowell, 4 Cal. 80.

In Fitchburg R. Co. v. Boston & N. R. Co., 3 Cush. 71, it appeared that the Legislature had established a harbor line for Boston Harbor, but prohibiting the extension of the existing wharves to the line without legislative permission. Afterwards the Legislature passed an Act authorizing the owners of certain wharves to extend them out to the line. This Act was held to be a grant, and not a mere revocable license (page 87); and in Hamlin v. Fairpoint Mfg. Co., 141 Mass. 57, 3 New Eng. Rep. 148, a legislative authority to extend wharves to the channel of a river was held equivalent to a grant of a possessory title, if not an absolute interest in the soil. In Norfolk v. Cooke, 27 Gratt. 488, the court treats the right to use and occupy the land within such lines with wharves, etc., as a qualified proprietary interest in the soil, sufficient to support an action for the possession. Guy v. Bernardes, 8 Cal. 74; *Power v.
Taswell*, 25 Gratt. 786.

But the title of the State is not extinguished by such legislative action merely. In this country the generally accepted doctrine is that the jus privatum passes to the owner of the adjacent lands, and in this State extends to low-water mark, with the accompanying riparian rights, while the jus publicum belongs to the State, which holds the title to the soil under the water as trustee. "The sovereign is trustee for the public, and the use of navigable waters is inalienable." 3 Kent, Com. 437.
See Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 89, 93.

The State is authorized to regulate the exercise of riparian rights in the interests of the public, and may also make concessions to private owners of possessory rights in the soil of navigable waters, the effect of which will be to give them private and exclusive rights equivalent to a grant. Gould, Waters, §§ 188-140.

While the public right of navigation and fishery may not be extinguished until the waters are excluded, yet after the submerged land is filled or occupied the riparian owner will have the exclusive right of possession, and the entire beneficial interest; and whether his dominion would be absolute, and his title indefensible as against the State, is not necessary to inquire. *Union Depot, S. R. & Transfer
Co. v. Brunswick*, supra.

The action of the Legislature in establishing a harbor line is to be construed as a regulation of the exercise of the riparian right. It settles the line of navigability, above which the State will not interfere, and is an implied concession of the right to build, possess and occupy to the established line, which amounts practically to a qualified possessory title. 141 Mass. 57, supra.

The importance and substantial character of these rights are recognized by the courts, and there is a growing tendency in different directions to give effect to contracts and grants in respect to riparian occupancy and improvements. Norfolk v. Cooke, 27 Gratt. 488; Farmer v. West Coast Picking Co. 17 Or. 515, 8 L.
R. A. 61.

It is true the right of access and communication with the navigable waters belongs exclusively to the riparian owner, except with his permission. But if in the case of a railway corporation he may, for a consideration, concede the right to occupy with its road-bed the land under the shore, and obstruct such communication by a valid contract, which we presume will not be questioned, why may he not contract with natural persons to grant to them the right of possession and occupancy of building sites within the dock line for wharves or elevators, for use in connection with navigation, or such other purposes (the State not objecting), as the grantees may be advised, with right of way, if need be, over his land, or, as in this case, impliedly over streets laid over the same as designated in the plat and dedicated to the public use? In many instances, however, such right of entry or easement of passage may be found entirely unnecessary, the occupant having other means of reaching the locus in quo. If the riparian owner may make such improvements, and afterwards grant and convey his possessory title, or contract to do so, the courts ought not to stand upon so narrow a distinction as that he may not bind himself by contract that another may have and enjoy the same possessory rights in a particular site or lot which he has in it, for his right is not a mere revocable license, though held in subordination to the public interest, and subject to some restraint for the general good as other property may be, though differently situated.
Com. v. Alger, supra, 95.

There can be no doubt, we think, that a lease of such property would be operative between the parties, and a subsequent purchaser of the upland, with notice and expressly subject thereto, would also be bound to respect the lessee's rights.

In reference to a lease of a mill-site in the bed of the Mississippi River (at a place not navigable), this court says in *St. Anthony Falls
Water Power Co. v. Morrison*, 12 Minn. 254
(Gil. 102): "It is not for a private individual, under a pretense of vindicating the abstract rights of the public, to set up the intrusion, in a private and civil action, for the purpose of repudiating his own solemn contract obligations."

In this case the respondent does not find it necessary to question the correctness of the decision in the case of *Lake Superior Land Co.
v. Emerson*, 88 Minn. 456, because there the grantor simply undertook to convey a strict legal title, which until the land was reclaimed could not be the subject of transfer, and we are not called on to distinguish that case. But this case is rested upon the contract of the parties, incorporated in the several deeds, in which it will be seen the grantor covenants that "the grantees and their assigns shall have the exclusive right to use, occupy and enjoy the space covered by the lots as described in the deed, and as identified by the plat, and covenants to en-stop the company and its assigns from having or claiming the use and occupancy of such space by virtue of riparian ownership or otherwise." Here there is an express waiver and concession of the grantor's riparian rights in the premises, and consent to the use and occupancy thereof, so as to cut off its access and communication with deep water, except in accordance with the general plan of improvement indicated by the plat. And this is also made a part of plaintiff's contract, and undoubtedly entered into and affected the consideration of the deed to him. He thereby made himself a party to the general plan and arrangement for the improvement and disposition of the property, in which there was nothing unlawful. He took with notice of defendant's deed. We see no reason why he should be relieved from the legitimate operation of these covenants, or why a court of equity should interpose to cancel or declare null and void the defendant's deed, in order to give the plaintiff rights he has expressly agreed to waive.

Order affirmed.

James C. MURRAY, Appt.,

James A. MURRAY et al., Exrs., etc., of Henry H. Murray, Deceased.

1. A conveyance on the eve of marriage, to be regarded in equity as a fraud upon the legal rights of the intended wife, and consequently not binding upon her, must be made without her consent or knowledge.

2. The fact that a conveyance, made by a man with the consent of his intended wife, reserved a life estate in himself, is not a matter of which she can complain.

3. A prima facie case of fraud on a wife's marital rights in her husband's estate exists where, without her knowledge, he gives, either before or after marriage, all or the greater portion of his property to his children by a former marriage.

(March 6, 1890.)

A PPEAL by complainant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Franklin County settling her rights in her deceased husband's estate in an action brought for the settlement of such estate, and to set aside certain conveyances made by him upon the alleged ground that they were in fraud of her marital rights. Reversed.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion.

Wm. John W. Rodman and George C. Drane, for appellant:

Voluntary conveyances, or gifts by the husband to his children or others of all or the bulk of his estate pending a marriage treaty or during the marriage without the knowledge or concurrence of the wife, will be presumed to be fraudulent and the onus is upon the grantees or donees, in a controversy with the widow, to show that no fraud was intended or practiced against her.

Fennecy v. Fennecy, 84 Ky. 519.

When such a gift is made with, and for, the purpose of defrauding the wife, it will be set aside to the extent it may affect her rights as widow.

Holt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In May, 1882, the appellant, Jane C. Murray, then Jane C. Jilison, first met Henry H. Murray. He was then a widower for the second time. During the summer of that year they became engaged to marry, the Christmas following being the time fixed for the consummation of the agreement. It was, however, postponed from time to time, at his instance, and upon one excuse or the other, until February 17, 1884, when they were married. He had three children living, to wit, William H. Murray by his first wife, and James A. and John W. Murray by his second wife. When he and the appellant became engaged, he was a gentleman of considerable fortune, being worth in lands and personalty probably not far from $70,000. This was then known to her. They lived together until December, 1886, when he died. In April, 1887, the appellant brought this action, seeking a settlement of his estate, and the cancellation, as to herself, of certain conveyances and gifts by him to his three sons, upon the ground that they were in fraud of her marital rights. Subsequent to their engagement to marry, and on August 17, 1882, he conveyed to his sons James A. and John W. Murray four houses and lots worth $4,000 or $5,000. It is conceded, however, in argument by appellant's counsel, that the consideration recited in the conveyance, to wit, that this property had come by the mother of the grantees, is true. The testimony so shows, and no recovery is now asked on account of it. It is therefore out of the case, and needs no further mention.

Subsequent, also, to their engagement, he, by a deed dated August 1, 1882, and acknowledged on October 30, and recorded November 28, following, conveyed to his sons James and John, in consideration of love and affection, the homestead where they were living, and another house and lot, the two pieces of property being worth from $15,000 to $25,000. The appellant admits, however, both in pleading and her evidence, that he informed her, before the making of this conveyance, of his intention to execute it, and she made no objection to it. She says, however, that she supposed it was to be an absolute one, by way of advancement to the two sons, and that it was not unreasonable in view of his financial condition as stated to her by him. She also says he then promised to do right by her, and provide well for her. She now claims, however, that the deed was in the nature of a testamentary disposition of the property, and in fraud of her coming marital rights, because it provided: "But there is reserved in said party of the first part [H. H. Murray] a right for life, at his option, to occupy, use, lease and enjoy the profits of each and all of said property for and during his natural life."

A conveyance upon the eve of marriage, to be regarded in equity as a fraud upon the marital rights of the intended wife, and consequently not binding upon her, must be made without her consent or knowledge. Zane v. Dorell, 8 Bush, 201.

Here she knew of it, and the fact that it conveyed a less estate than she supposed cannot serve as a ground of complaint for her. It was an advantage to her. She, together with her husband, enjoyed during his life the use of at least the homestead, if not all of the property covered by the deed. The conveyances named appear to have embraced all the real estate owned by H. H. Murray.

April 8, 1884, he, in consideration of love and affection, assigned to his son James A. Murray a judgment against the Blantons, secured by mortgage lien, and amounting to about $7,000. The son says that his father had told him some four or five years before that he was to have this debt, and in this statement he is supported by the evidence of the draughtsman of the assignment of the debt, who says that the father said, when he executed it, that he had heretofore given it to the son. The gift was, however, not perfected until April 8, 1884. At the same time, the father, for the same consideration, assigned to the same son a mortgage debt on one Herrman for about $4,000; also a certificate for thirty shares of bank stock, worth $4,500. In November, 1885, he gave to James A., for John Murray, United States bonds of the value of $12,750. Also, at about the same time, he gave to his son William railroad bonds, payable to bearer, worth $4,800. Thus we see that shortly after his marriage he gave to his three sons about $24,000. With the last of these gifts his fortune was substantially gone. The wife had no knowledge of those made after their marriage. At his death he was worth but about $12,500, consisting altogether of personalty. A few days after his marriage he made a will by which he bequeathed all his estate, without naming his wife. It is contended for her that these gifts were merely colorable, and intended to be effective only in case his wife outlived him. In support of this, it is shown that the bank stock was never transferred upon the bank books until after his death, that the checks for the dividends thereon, and for the interest on the United States and railroad bonds, were issued payable to him until his death, and there is some evidence tending to show that he took some control of the property which was purchased in payment of the Blanton debt. The transfers, however, vested the donees with either the legal or equitable title; and there is rebutting testimony showing that they controlled the property from the date of the gifts, and received the money upon the checks issued in payment of the bank dividends, and the interest upon the bonds.

The question remains, however, whether the gifts of the personalty are, under the circumstances, to be regarded as having been made in fraud of the appellant's marital rights. The sons testify—and they are doubtless honest in the belief—that they were bona fide, and made without any intention to defraud the appellant as to her inchoate rights in the estate of her husband. It is difficult, however, in the face of this record, to believe that there was not a purpose upon the part of the husband to lessen the wife's interest in his estate, in the event she survived him, by giving it to his sons. We do not mean to intimate that a husband cannot make any advances to his children, and must preserve his estate intact to meet the inchoate claims of his wife. If the advancements or gifts be reasonable, when considered with reference to the amount of property owned by the husband, and his purpose be to provide for the children, and not to defraud the wife, then she cannot complain, although they in fact diminish the property to which her inchoate rights have attached by the marriage. It is a question of intention upon the part of the grantor. If the property given away constitute all, or the principal part, of the husband's estate, and be such an advancement as is unreasonable, when compared with his entire property, then, while it should not be conclusively presumed to have been made in fraud of the wife's marital rights, yet prima facie it should be so regarded, and the onus of showing otherwise be cast upon the donee. Each case must depend upon its own circumstances. If not done to prevent the wife from enjoying a reasonable portion of the husband's estate, or to deprive her of such an interest in it as she might reasonably expect upon her marriage, then the advancement should be upheld as to her. The court must look to the condition of the parties, and all the attending circumstances, in judging of the transaction. It should take into consideration the amount of the husband's estate, the value of the advancements, the time within which they are made, and all other indicia which will serve to determine the intention accompanying the transaction.

If, however, a gift or voluntary conveyance of all or the greater portion of his property be made to his children by a former marriage without the knowledge of the intended wife, or it be advanced to them after marriage without the wife's knowledge, a prima facie case of fraud arises; and it rests upon the beneficiary to explain away such presumption. If the husband have an ample estate, he may, of course, give to the children of a former marriage a reasonable portion of it, and the wife cannot complain. If this were not the rule, then the hands of the husband would be completely and unreasonably tied, and he could make no advancement to his children by a former marriage, however large his estate, and however needful to them; but he would be compelled to hold it all, except from purchasers for value, to meet the inchoate claims of the wife.

Justice Story says that reasonable provision may be made for the children of a former marriage if done under such circumstances as evidence good faith. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 273.

In this instance, however, the husband, by successive gifts, advanced to his children, without the knowledge of his wife, nearly all his large estate. They were not her children, and the transfers deprived her of that reasonable expectation as to the enjoyment of a portion of his property which she had a right to form at their marriage. A prima facie case arises in her favor. It is attempted to overturn it with the claim that the greater portion of the husband's property came by the second wife; but, while it appears that she derived some property from her mother, yet the amount of it is not even approximately shown, and is a matter of conjecture. The husband, within a comparatively short time after his marriage to the appellant, and without her knowledge, gave to his children by his former marriages between $30,000 and $40,000. What he so gave, together with his estate remaining at his death, amounts to about $48,000. Allowing for reasonable advancements to the children, the wife was, in our opinion, entitled to $10,000 as her distributable portion of the estate. This, it seems to us, is the equity of the case. The gifts made to the children subsequent to her marriage must, under the circumstances, be regarded as having been made in fraud of her marital rights; and the amount of them, together with the estate of the husband, remaining at his death, less what would have been reasonable advances to the children must be estimated in determining her rights. The chancellor will allow, as of the date of his decree, the sum above named. Any equities which may exist between the other parties to this action remain open for further settlement, not being now presented for determination.

The judgment below, and which allowed the appellant as her distributable portion but one third of the estate in her husband's possession, at the time of his death, is reversed, and the cause is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

v.

Frederick WALL, Appt.

(.....Pa.....)

1. The responsibility of an innkeeper for goods and moneys of his guest extends to moneys stolen from the guest, unless they were stolen by a servant or companion of the guest.
2. The intoxication of a guest at an inn is no excuse for his negligence which contributes to the loss of his property by theft.

3. On evidence that the vest of a guest in a hotel was taken in the night while the door of his room was locked and bolted, and found in the morning in the dining-room carefully folded and laid between two blankets, but his money which he left in it missing, and that an outer door of the hotel bore marks of violence while his door did not, and other evidence showing that plaintiff had been drinking, to some extent at least, the night before, the question of his negligence should be left to the jury, considering the general uncertainty and mystery of the robbery.

4. Whether a guest at a hotel should be

NOTE.—Innkeeper, responsibility of.

The relation of guest does not depend on the time the traveler remains, or on the contract to pay. Jaffe v. Cardinal, 35 Wis. 118.

The relation of innkeeper and guest is not necessarily and conclusively changed by an agreement as to price or any definite length of sojourn. Ross v. Melvin, 55 Minn. 481.

Innkeepers are responsible for the well and safe keeping and custody of the goods and chattels of their guests, and even the absence of negligence will not exempt them from liability. Shaw v. Berry, 31 Me. 478.

The particular responsibility of an innkeeper does not extend to goods lost or stolen from a room occupied by a guest for a purpose of business distinct from his accommodation as guest, such as the exhibition of samples of merchandise. Fisher v. Kelsey, 121 U. S. 283 (30 L. ed. 930).

He is not responsible under the Missouri statute, unless the guest shall have given written notice of having such merchandise for sale or sample, after entering the inn, or unless such loss shall be caused by fire intentionally produced by the innkeeper or his servants, or by their theft. Express knowledge of the innkeeper is not equivalent to written notice. Ibid.

They are liable for the loss of goods of a boarder only where they have been guilty of culpable negligence. Manning v. Wells, 9 Hump. 746.

Liability of innkeeper as insurer.

At common law, innholders, like common carriers, are regarded as insurers of the property committed to their care and are liable for any loss if not caused by the act of God, or by a public enemy, or by the neglect or fault of the guest. Mason v. Thompson, 9 Pick. 280; Berkshire Woollen Co. v. 6 L. R. A.

But he is not an insurer of the goods of a traveler who is not a guest. Lusk v. Belote, 23 Minn. 488.

Either case or assumption lies for the loss of baggage through negligence of the innkeeper. Dickinson v. Winchester, 4 Cush. 114.

To make an innkeeper liable in trover, there must be an actual conversion of goods intrusted to him by the guest. Hallenbake v. Fish, 8 Wend. 547, 24 Am. Dec. 55; Wilkins v. Earle, 44 N. Y. 183; Sager v. Blain, Id. 449; Needles v. Howard, 1 E. D. Smith, 60.

Many cases hold that an innkeeper is liable as an insurer for the goods of his guest, and for losses by theft or fire which occur without the negligence of the innkeeper, and is only excused by the act of God, of the public enemy or of the guest. 2 Parsons, Cont. 146; 2 Story, Cont. § 909; Saunders, Neg. 212; *Hulett v. treated as having notice of the existence of a safe is a question for the jury, where he has frequently stopped there and there is evidence that on some visit his attention had been called to the safe by the landlord.

5. Whether carrying a certain amount of money to his room instead of placing it in the hotel safe is negligence on the part of the guest, is a question for the jury.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Chester County in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover from a hotel keeper the value of certain money which had been stolen from plaintiff while a guest in the hotel. Reversed.

Wall was the keeper of a hotel in Phoenixville. Shultz was the driver of a beer wagon and came to the hotel of Wall on the evening of July 2, 1890, with his wagon and team, put his team in the hotel stable, and remained as a guest of the hotel during the night of July 2, the day and night of the third, and a part of the fourth. Shultz was assigned to a chamber on the door of which was a lock with key upon the inside, and also an inside sliding bolt. A notice was printed at the head of each sheet of the hotel register, which read as follows: "Money, jewelry and other valuables must be placed in the safe. Otherwise the proprietor will not be responsible for loss." Wall claimed to have called Shultz's attention to this notice.

On the night of July 3, Shultz procured a night key to enable him to enter the hotel after it should be closed for the night. He testified that between eleven o'clock and midnight he entered the house by means of the night key and went to his room and retired, and that upon rising in the morning he discovered that his vest was missing and that he had been robbed of some $180 in cash.

Upon the door by which Shultz had entered

The liability is in some cases held to extend only to necessary articles. Traher v. Burrows, 27 Md. 120; Maltby v. Chapman, 25 Md. 510; Sisson v. Clark, 27 Ga. 242; Myers v. Cottrell, 5 Ill. 405; Simon v. Miller, 7 La. Ann. 203.

But in others it is held that his liability is not limited to articles and money necessary for traveling. Pinkerton v. Woodward, 25 Cal. 371; Snider v. Geiss, 1 Yeates, 84.

An innkeeper is, however, liable for all losses which could have been prevented by ordinary care (Newson ad. Axon, 1 McCord, L. 809); but the loss must have been a guest at the time of the loss. Townson v. Havre-de-Grace Bank, 6 Har. & J. 47.

To render the innkeeper liable the goods must have been brought within the inn. Kent, Com. 500; Albin v. Presby, 8 N. H. 405; Calye's Case, 5 Coke, 84; Sanders v. Spencer, 3 Dyer, 205 b; Farnworth v. (Ky.) 430; Norcross v. Norcross, 53 Me. 145.

The proprietor of a hotel is liable for the loss of baggage of guests through the negligence of a carrier to whom it has been delivered for transportation to the hotel, and whose apparent duty is, by authority of such proprietor, to transport guests and baggage to such hotel; and any private arrangement between the proprietor and carrier unknown to the guest is immaterial. Cookery v. Nagle (Ga.) 6 L. R. A. 408, and note.

Liability as bailee.

An innkeeper is liable for money deposited by a guest in the hotel safe, and stolen from it (Wilkins v. Earle, 44 N. Y. 171); and for money deposited with the barkeeper on the credit of the inn. Houser v. Tully, 61 Pa. 92.

The admission of a servant of an inn that he had stolen the jewelry of a guest is not evidence against the innkeeper. Elox v. Hill, 85 U. S. 218 (25 L. ed. 103).

He is liable for the loss of baggage of a guest left in his custody. Adams v. Clem, 41 Ga. 65; Giles v. Fauntleroy, 13 Md. 124.

He is liable for goods lost during the temporary absence of the guest although the absence extends over several days. Grinnell v. Cook, 3 Hill, 490; McDonald v. Edgerton, 5 Barb. 540; Day v. Bather, 3 Hurst. & C. 14; Bather v. Day, 35 L. J. N. S. (Exch.) 3 L. R. A.

Proof of loss of goods, while in charge of the innkeeper, is sufficient prima facie to charge him with liability. Hill v. Owen, 5 Blackf. 200, 25 Am. Dec. 124; Laird v. Nichol, 10 Ind. 212.

Innkeeper may defend on ground of contributory negligence of guest. Elox v. Hill, supra; Houser v. Tully, 61 Pa. 92; Hawley v. Smith, 25 Wend. 642; Chamberlain v. Masterson, 26 Ala. 271; Hadley v. Upshaw, 27 Tex. 347; Kelsey v. Barry, 49 Ill. 459.

Where a guest, on leaving a hotel without the intention of returning as a guest, but without paying his bill, leaves his value in the charge of the hotel clerk, and returns within forty-eight hours, the innkeeper is liable as a bailee for want of ordinary care; and the loss of the value raises a presumption of negligence against him. Murray v. Marshall, 9 Colo. 422.

Innkeepers are not bound to receive and keep property of a person who is neither a traveler nor a guest. Grinnell v. Cook, 3 Hill, 490.

A visit by one not requiring present accommodations, but for the purpose of simply depositing money for safe keeping, does not constitute the visitor a guest. Hence, a gambler depositing his money without registering his name is not a guest. Arcade Hotel Co. v. Wintz, 3 West. Rep. 218, 44 Ohio St. 22.

In Illinois a hotel keeper is exempt from liability for money, jewels and the like, lost by his guest, where a safe for the keeping of such articles is provided, and notice given as required by the statute, and the guest fails to take the benefit of the protection thus furnished him. Elox v. Hill, 85 U. S. 218 (25 L. ed. 103).

To this rule the statute makes one exception. If the loss occurs "by the hand or through the negligence of the landlord, or by a clerk or servant employed by him in such hotel or inn," the liability remains; but not if the loss was occasioned by the negligence of the guest himself. Ibid.; 3 Story, Cont. § 908.

For a guest at a hotel to retain the sum of about $500 in a belt upon his person while sleeping in a room by himself is not negligence as a matter of law, even though the belt on the door could be opened from the outside by means of a wire. Smith v. Wilson, 20 Minn. 234.

with his right key there was both a lock and a dead latch. He was himself the last person to enter that door upon that night, and the next morning the lock was found to have been broken off.

Shultz testified that he both locked and bolted his bed-room door before retiring, but that the next morning he found it standing partially open. If a thief entered that room it was admitted that he entered through that door, which bore no evidence whatever of the lock or bolt having been forced. The vest was found down stairs carefully folded and laid between two lap blankets on the hat-rack in the dining-room, with the pocket-book and everything intact, but the money gone. Matches of a kind not used in the hotel were found scattered at various points.

Wall's hostler, Rabu, testified that at about 11 o'clock of the night of the robbery some men called at his room seeking Shultz, and Mrs. Wall testified that between 11 and 12 o'clock she heard voices on the porch, one of which she recognized as Shultz's.

The court charged the jury, inter alia, as follows:

["As I understand the law of this Commonwealth relating to the liability of an innkeeper, I instruct you that he is answerable for all losses happening to the goods of travelers becoming his guests, except such losses as are caused by the act of God or the public enemy, or by improper conduct of the guest himself, or his servant, or the companion whom he brings with him. Wherever the loss does not occur by reason of any of these excepted causes, then the innkeeper in this Commonwealth, in judgment of this court, is answerable for that loss."] (Fifth assignment of error.)

["Mr. Shultz had no servant and he had no companion, and we say to you that we see no testimony in the case which would warrant the jury in concluding that Mr. Shultz by his conduct contributed to the theft, if that theft was committed. You will therefore see that under our view of the law, if a theft was committed in this house, Mr. Wall is answerable for the amount of the loss. You will also see that under the views of the court you have nothing to consider except the question whether or not there was a theft in this house. If there was, then you will ascertain the measure of damages which Mr. Shultz sustained, and the measure of damages will be the amount of that loss."] (Sixth assignment of error.)

Defendant requested the court to charge, inter alia:

(2) If the jury find that there was a sufficient lock and bolt on the door of the room occupied by the plaintiff, if properly used, to insure the safety of his property, and if they believe, from the evidence, that the plaintiff did not make use of safety thus supplied him, it is for the jury to find from all the facts whether, under the circumstances of the case, the plaintiff has not discharged the defendant, and, if they so find, the verdict should be for the defendant. Answer. In answer to this point, gentlemen, we say that we see no evidence in the case which would justify the jury in concluding that the plaintiff had not made use of the proper means of safety which were furnished him, and therefore disaffirm the point. (Second assignment of error.)

(3) The fact of the guest having the means of securing himself, and choosing not to use them, is one which, with other circumstances of the case, is for the jury to consider; and if they should find from that fact and other circumstances in the case, that the plaintiff did not exercise the ordinary care of a prudent man under the circumstances, and was thus guilty of contributory negligence, their verdict should be for the defendant. Answer. The principles of law, set out in that point, are correct. We say to you that there is no evidence in the case, in the estimation of the court, which would warrant you in applying them to the law as here set out, and we therefore disaffirm the point for the reason given. (Third assignment of error.)

There was a verdict for plaintiff for $100.00 and, a rule for a new trial having been discharged, defendant appealed.

Messrs. I. N. Wynn, Archibald M. Holding and Robert M. Monaghan, for appellant.

Although the loss in itself raises a presumption of negligence on the part of the innkeeper, or of those for whom he is responsible, it is not irrebuttable, but may be overcome by satisfactory proof that the loss did not occur through the negligence of him, or those for whom he is responsible.

Mr. H. H. Gilkyson, for appellee:

The liability of the innkeeper, in cases of loss or theft, does not depend upon the measure of care with which he keeps the goods of a guest, nor the means which he has employed to protect them. His liability is analogous to that of a common carrier, who is held absolutely responsible for all loss of goods while in his control, and under his custody, unless the loss be occasioned by an act of God or the public enemy.

Culpe's Case, 8 Coke, 88, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. *194, 7th Am. ed. 241; Sibley v. Aldrich, 33 N. H. 553; Hulet v. Swift, 33 N. Y. 571; Peabard v. Northcraft, 2 Mot. (Ky.) 439; Slaw v. Derry, 51 Me. 478; Samson v. Clark, 57 Ga. 242; Mason v. Thompson, 9 Pick. 280.

The goods are under the protection of the inn, so as to make the innkeeper liable for a breach of duty, unless the negligence of the guest occasions the loss in such a way that the loss could not have happened if the guest had used the ordinary care that a prudent man may be reasonably expected to have taken under the circumstances.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

As long ago as Chancellor Kent's day it was said: "The responsibility of an innkeeper for the goods of his guest . . . has been a point of much discussion in the books." 2 Kent, Com. 592.

The common-law rule, as established in Culpe's Case, 8 Coke, 88, was that the innkeeper was bound absolutely to keep safe the goods of his guest deposited within the inn, and Kent, after considering the cases, lays it down that "an innkeeper, like a common carrier, is an insurer of the goods of his guest." 2 Kent, Com. 594.

The subject is also learnedly discussed in the notes to Culpe's Case, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. *197, and the notes to Coggs v. Bernard, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. *307, where the learned American annotators sum up the rule in the following form: "An innkeeper is answerable for all losses happening to the goods of travelers becoming his guests, except such losses as are caused by the Act of God, or the public enemies, or by the conduct of the guest himself, or his servant, or the companion whom he brings with him."

The learned counsel for the appellant has presented us a strong array of authorities to show that the true foundation of the rule as administered in the later cases both in England and many of our sister States is the negligence of the innkeeper, and the only difference between the innkeeper and ordinary bailee is that a loss is prima facie proof of the innkeeper's negligence, and throws upon him the burden of disproving it. If the question were open it might be interesting to examine how far the desire to fix the exact limits of the liability, by resting it on something more definite than public policy, has led to modification of the severity of the common-law rule. Conceding negligence to be the foundation, we must logically concede the desired result, that if the innkeeper shows by satisfactory proof that he took due care, he is absolved from liability. For my own part I apprehend that the liability, like that of a common carrier, rested on the surrender of the owner's possession and control of his goods, and public policy which, for the protection of the owner under such circumstances, precluded every excuse for not restoring the goods to the owner, except such as were the result of vis major, the act of God or the public enemies, which would be notorious, and could not be fraudulently pretended.

But the rule, whatever its foundation, is no longer open to question in this State.

In Housser v. Tully, 62 Pa. 92, the common-law liability was laid down by Williams, J., in the following emphatic terms: "His responsibility extends to all his servants and domestics, and to all the goods and moneys of his guest which are placed within the inn; and he is bound in every event to pay for them if stolen unless they were stolen by a servant or companion of the guest." The learned counsel for appellant has distinguished this case very carefully and accurately upon the facts, and claims that the enunciation of the general rule, above quoted, was not really necessary to the decision of the case actually before the court and that it is therefore only dictum. If the case stood alone there would be good ground for the claim, and we might be required now to re-examine the foundation and merits of the rule announced. But in Walsh v. Porterfield, 87 Pa. 376, the former case was distinctly affirmed in all the breadth of the opinion. The judge below had charged the jury that "at common law an innkeeper was liable, at all events, for the goods and baggage of his guests, . . . and the law is the same to-day . . . It was, in fact, insuring, as it were, the safety of the property of guests, and it was immaterial (if a loss occurred or property was stolen whilst the guest was in the hotel) by whom it was stolen, unless it was by the guest's own servant or a fellow guest of the party who was robbed, or the negligence of the guest; and however vigilant the landlord might have been, he was responsible to the party losing the property. That was the common-law liability. He was practically an insurer of the safety of the property whilst the guests remained in his house."

It was assigned for error that this charge was too broad, and eminent counsel argued there, as here, that the real foundation of the rule is the negligence of the landlord or his servants; but this court in affirming the judgment said: "We adhere to the statement of the law as laid down by our late brother Williams, in Housser v. Tully, as to the extent and character of the liability of innkeepers for the goods of their guests. An innkeeper is bound to pay for goods stolen in his house from a guest, unless stolen by the servant or companion of the guest. . . . The learned judge below, in his charge to the jury, evidently adopted this case as his chart, and there is no error in his instructions upon the law."

After this deliberate affirmance of the common law rule in a case where it was applied and the correctness of the instruction distinctly assigned for error, we must regard the rule as settled.

The learned judge therefore was right in the general instruction he gave the jury as to the foundation of the plaintiff's case. In the press of the trial, however, the defense unfortunately did not receive the same consideration. Neither the question of contributory neg-ligance nor the effect of the Statute of 1835 was presented to the jury as it should have been.

Volenti non fit injuria, and conduct of the plaintiff contributing to the loss, whether voluntary or negligent, is always a defense. This principle, though not very clearly enunciated, was applied to the liability of an innkeeper even in Calpe's Case, where the first resolution was that if the horse was put to pasture at the guest's request and stolen, the innkeeper was not liable, and the eighth (8 Coke, 33), that if the innkeeper requires his guest to put his goods in such a chamber under lock, and the guest leave them in an outer court and they are stolen, the innkeeper shall not be liable. And however it might have been in the days of good Queen Bess, when Calpe's Case was decided, and when the length of his wine bill might have been deemed sufficient consideration for the duty of an innkeeper to take care of his guest drunk or sober, it is now held in our own case of Walsh v. Porterfield that intoxication is no excuse for the negligence of a guest which contributes to his loss.

The evidence in the present case leaves the circumstances of the robbery in some degree of mystery. According to the plaintiff's story, he locked and bolted his chamber door on going to bed, and found it open on waking in the morning. The back outer door of the hotel bore marks of violence with a hammer or other tool, the catch of the dead latch was broken off, and latches of a kind not used in the hotel were found scattered at various points. All this pointed to a burglary by outside parties. Yet the evidence is that the plaintiff's bedroom door bore no marks of violence anywhere, the key was in the lock, and the transom window was but a foot high and swung in the middle leaving only a space of six inches through which no person could possibly climb. How then did the thief get in? There is no theory which does not encounter some difficulties, and the first question that arises in the mind is whether the plaintiff may not be mistaken in supposing he locked and bolted his door. The testimony is, that though a sober man he was not a total abstainer, and had been drinking that evening. Did he get more than he thought and is his recollection thereby beclouded? Or did he lock and bolt the door as he thinks, and did the burglar get him up again in a confused condition of mind, and was his open door the result of this? The other circumstances only add to the difficulty of a satisfactory explanation. The evidence in general, as already said, points to a robbery by outside parties. But the vest carefully folded and laid between the two lap blankets on the hat-rack in the dining-room is hard to reconcile with such a theory. Again, the evidence of Mrs. Wall as to the voices on the porch, and of Rahn as to the men asking for plaintiff, suggest the possibility of other parties in company with plaintiff and the loss of the money before he entered his room. As already said, there is no view of the evidence that does not meet with some difficulty, and such difficulty is always for the jury to solve.

Jurors are to exercise the same common sense and judgment in the jury box that they do as men in the affairs of life, only with a strict regard, under the direction of the court, to the nature, relevancy and weight of evidence upon both sides. They cannot base verdicts on surmise or conjecture without evidence, but they are not bound to believe an incredible story because no witness contradicts it. It is for them to survey the whole case and say whether the party having the burden of proof has met it by a satisfactory preponderance of evidence. The learned judge below was of opinion that there was not sufficient evidence of plaintiff's negligence to be considered by the jury, and therefore, though stating the law correctly as to such negligence, he limited the jury to the consideration of the single question, whether or not there was a theft. In this view we are unable to concur. The difficulties in the way of the plaintiff's theory and the general uncertainty of the entire occurrence should have sent the whole case to the jury with an affirmation of defendant's second and third points.

The evidence in regard to the safe and the notice to guests is not as full and satisfactory as it might be, but it was sufficient to go to the jury. The provisions of the Act of the 7th of May, 1835 (Pub. Laws, 479), in regard to the place where notices must be posted, are intended to secure knowledge brought home to the guest. They may be said to be mandatory in the sense that as they amount to constructive notice; they must be strictly complied with if constructive notice is relied on. But if notice in fact is proved, then the provisions for constructive notice become immaterial. Defendant testified positively to having called the plaintiff's attention to the notice at the head of the hotel register, though it was probably not on this particular visit. The defendant denied it. This question should have gone to the jury for them to determine, under all the circumstances, the lapse of time since plaintiff saw the notice, if they find that he did have his attention called to it, the frequency of his visits and his consequent familiarity with the customs of the house, etc., whether he should be treated as having notice of the existence of a safe, and if so, whether his omission to avail himself of that protection, and his carrying such an amount of money to his bedroom, was negligence for which he must himself bear the loss.

Judgment reversed, and venire de novo awarded.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS

v.

Minnie R. FROMAN et al.

(.....Ky.....)

1. Proof of the conduct of husband and wife toward each other, and of their expressions of hatred and fear of each other, and of their statements, during the time they lived together apparently as husband and wife, as to non-access, may be admitted to show non-access, on the question as to the legitimacy of a child.

2. The presumption that a child born in wedlock is legitimate, where the husband and wife had opportunities of access, is not conclusive, but may be overcome by clear proof of the contrary, which may consist of proof that the husband was incompetent to have sexual intercourse with his wife or she with him.

3. Proof of the wife's adultery is competent on the question of the legitimacy of a child, to corroborate proof that the husband was not capable of performing the sexual act or that he had abstained from performing it with his wife.

4. A mother is a competent witness to prove the legitimacy of her child begotten during wedlock if such legitimacy is attacked; and in case she becomes a witness she will not be permitted to withhold on cross-examination any part of the truth, even although it will disclose acts of adultery.

5. A woman who, during her abandonment of her husband, admits any man or man to her periodically or whenever it is convenient or opportunity is afforded, is living in adultery within the meaning of the Kentucky statutes which forfeit her dower or distributable share in her husband's property, when she voluntarily leaves him and lives in adultery.

(November 23, 1923.)

APPEAL by cross-defendants from a judgment of the Louisville Law and Equity Court in favor of cross-petitioners in a suit brought by the executor of Solomon Froman, deceased, to obtain a settlement of his accounts, etc., the cross-petition setting up the birth of an heir after the making of the will, and praying a distribution of the estate to such heir subject to the dower rights of his mother. Reversed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. Burton Vance for Laura Goss, appellant.

Messrs. Brown, Humphrey & Davis, C. B. Seymour and W. H. McGee for other devisees and heirs, appellants.

Messrs. Thomas H. Hines and J. M. Wilkins, with Messrs. Abbott & Rutledge, for Elizabeth Wilson, appellant.

The prima facie evidence of legitimacy may always be lawfully rebutted by satisfactory evidence that access did not take place between husband and wife, as by the law of nature is necessary in order for the man, in fact, to be father of the child.

NOTE.—Presumption of legitimacy of child born in wedlock.

Bastards are persons begotten and born out of lawful wedlock. Miller v. Anderson, 1 West. Rep. 310, 43 Ohio St. 472; 1 Bl. Com. 454; 3 Kent, Com. 208.

If a woman pregnant at her marriage is delivered after marriage the child is legitimate. Miller v. Anderson, supra.

The law presumes a child to have been born in lawful wedlock, and this presumption must prevail until overcome by clear and convincing proof adduced by those alleging illegitimacy. Orthwein v. Thomas, 4 L. R. A. 434, 127 Ill. 364.

Children of a married woman, born during coverture, are presumed to be legitimate. Re Romero's Estate, 75 Cal. 373.

The fact that a woman gave birth to a fully developed child so soon after marriage as to render it certain that it was begotten before marriage raises a legal presumption that it was begotten by him who became her husband. McCulloch v. McCulloch, 39 Tex. 323.

The presumption of legitimacy is a presumption juris et de jure. Miller v. Anderson, 1 West. Rep. 311, 43 Ohio St. 472.

The burden of proving illegitimacy lies entirely with the person seeking to establish it. Overlook v. Hall, 31 Me. 342; Piowen v. Boney, 3 Jur. N. S. 333, 31 L. J. N. S. Ch. 401.

But in a later decision in England it has been held that it is not a presumption juris et de jure, but may be rebutted by evidence which must be clear and conclusive and not resting merely on a balance of probability. So where a child was born 278 days after the last opportunity of the husband's access, and there was evidence in the wife's conduct tending to show that she regarded the child as the offspring of her paramour, the question of its legitimacy was properly submitted to the jury. 3 L. R. A.

Bozville v. Atty-Gen. L. R. 13 Prob. Div. 177; Morris v. Davis, 5 Clark & F. 103.

A legal presumption relieves him in whose favor it exists from the necessity of any proof, but may be destroyed by rebutting evidence. Otherwise as to presumptions juris et de jure, against which no proof can be admitted. Dugas v. Estiletta, 3 La. Ann. 539; Davenport v. Mason, 15 Mass. 35; Bailem v. State, 17 Ala. 451.

Presumption in favor of the legitimacy of children will not be made where the question is to be determined as one of fact and not of law. Blackburn v. Crawford, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 175 (13 L. ed. 133).

The presumption of legitimacy may be rebutted.

The presumption of legitimacy may be rebutted both by positive and by presumptive evidence. Wright v. Hicks, 13 Ga. 155, 13 Ga. 160.

In Louisiana this legal presumption can be overcome only in the mode and within the time prescribed by law. Dejol v. Johnson, 13 La. Ann. 333.

Nowhere it can be overcome only by clear and convincing proof of non-intercourse between the husband and wife. Egbert v. Greenwalt, 44 Mich. 280; Van Aernam v. Van Aernam, 1 Barb. Ch. 373; Patterson v. Gaines, 67 U. S. 3 How. 330 (13 L. ed. 353); Sullivan v. Kelly, 3 Allen, 143; Hemmenway v. Townser, 1 Allen, 203; Flettesham v. Julian, 1 Y. B. 1 Hen. IV. 3, pl. 12; Stegall v. Stegall, 3 Brook. 223; Cannon v. Cannon, 7 Humph. 410.

The presumption of legitimacy of a child born during the period of marriage is not rebutted by circumstances which create only doubt and suspicion, but is wholly removed by showing, first, that the husband was incompetent; second, that he was entirely absent, so as to have had no access to the mother; third, or entirely absent at the period during which the child must, in the course of nature, have been begotten; fourth, and present only

The presumption of sexual intercourse between husband and wife may be rebutted by evidence of the feelings and conduct of the parties.

Mrs. Froman was permitted to testify that she had never been unfaithful to her husband, and had never had intercourse, since her marriage, with anyone but him. This was error under the Civil Code, § 606, which provides: "Neither a husband nor his wife shall testify, even after the cessation of their marriage, concerning any communication between them during marriage."

Messrs. Helm & Bruce for appellees.

Bennett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Minnie R. Froman is the widow of Solomon Froman, deceased. He died testate on the 3d day of June, 1884. Solomon White Froman, son of Minnie R. Froman, was begotten during the wedlock of Solomon Froman and Minnie R. Froman, and was born on the 3d day of January, 1885, about seven months after the death of the putative father, Solomon Froman. Solomon Froman's will made no provision for this after-born child, nor any provision for Minnie R. Froman, the widow. Solomon White Froman claimed the entire estate, under the statute, as an after-born pretermitted child. The widow renounced the provisions of the will, and claimed her dowerable and distributable share of the estate. Issue was joined as to the legitimacy of Solomon White Froman, and as to the forfeiture of the widow's dowerable and distributable interest by reason of her abandoning her husband, Solomon Froman, and living in adultery. These issues were decided against the devisees under the will, and they have appealed to this court.

It is to be regretted that questions like these should ever arise in the courts of this Commonwealth. Kentucky's matrons are famed for their high sense of virtue and exemplary conduct; and it is to be regretted that the conduct of Mrs. Minnie R. Froman was so radical a departure from this fair fame as to impel us to declare her son, Solomon White Froman, illegitimate. The proof is that Mrs. Froman left the house of her husband, Solomon Froman, on the morning of the 4th of April, 1884, and went direct to Bowling Green, to the house of a Mrs. Wilson, where she remained at least a week, and then returned to Louisville, and took boarding with a certain woman, and under circumstances which afford clear and satisfactory proof that there was no sexual intercourse. Hargrave v. Hargrave, 9 Beav. 345; Com. v. Stricker, 1 Browne (Pa.) Append. XLVII.

Proof of impotency of husband.

It is presumed that a mature male has normal powers of virility, and the burden of proving the contrary is on the party asserting it. Gardner v. State, 31 Ga. 144.

The presumption of legitimacy arising from the sleeping together of husband and wife can be rebutted only by clear and satisfactory evidence that some physical incapacity existed. Legge v. Edmunds, 25 L. J. N. S. Ch. 126.

The evidence must prove beyond all reasonable doubt that the husband could not have been the father. Phillips v. Allen, 3 Allen, 438.

The impotency of the putative father, if true and proven, would be conclusive, and evidence thereof is competent. State v. Broadway, 69 N. C. 411.

Proof of non-access.

Access between man and wife is always presumed until otherwise plainly proved, and nothing is allowed to impugn the legitimacy of a child, short of proofs of facts showing it to be impossible that the husband could have been its father. Gaines v. Hennen, 65 U. S. 34 How. 558 (16 L. ed. 770).

But if a husband went beyond seas two years before the birth of his child, the conclusion is irresistible that it is illegitimate. Rex v. Maldstone, 13 East, 550.

So illegitimacy may be shown by proof of abandonment by the husband, and his continued absence from the State, for a period of four years before the birth of the child. Pittsford v. Chittenden, 2 New Eng. Rep. 181, 58 Vt. 48.

Non-access of the husband need not be proved during the whole period of the wife's pregnancy. 8 L. R. A.

If the circumstances show a natural impossibility that he could be the father, as where he had access only a fortnight before the birth. Rex v. Luffe, 5 East, 198.

Where a husband after a long absence did not rejoin his wife until eight months before the birth of a full grown child, he could not have been the father. Heathcote's Divorce Bill, 1 Macq. H. L. Cas. 468.

Opportunity of access becomes important to consider, where the wife was notoriously living in adultery. Rex v. Mansfield, 1 Q. B. 444, 5 Jur. 808.

Where the child was born three months after the marriage, the wife was asked on cross-examination, "When did you first become acquainted with your husband?" and on her answering "Twelve months" the subject was dismissed. Anon. v. Anon. 25 Beav. 481; State v. Romaine, 58 Iowa, 48.

Where husband and wife, although living separate and apart, had been in such a situation that access might have been had, the presumption is favor of legitimacy can be rebutted only by strong evidence; and if the access is proved, no inquiry as to paternity can be made. Morris v. Davies, 3 Clark & F. 108, 1 Jur. 911.

Parties themselves not competent witnesses on the subject of access.

A woman cannot give evidence of the non-access of her husband to bastardize her issue, though the husband be deceased (Rex v. Kea, 11 East, 12; Goodright v. Mom, Cowp. 351); but the mother is a competent witness to prove the illegitimacy of her children. Rex v. Bramley, 6 T. R. 380; Starden v. Starden, 6 T. R. 381 note (b.); Peake, N. P. 2; Rex v. Reading, Lea, Can. t. Hardw. 79; Rex v. Luffe 5 East, 198; Tioga Co. v. South Creek Twp. 75 P. 488.

The evidence of the husband is not admissible to there remained as boarder until the death of her husband, never visiting or seeing her husband after she left his house on the 4th of April preceding, although she left him sick of a fatal disease, of which he died on the 8d of June. Mrs. Froman claims that her husband, Solomon Froman, on the morning of the 8d of April,—the day before she left his house,—sent for her to come to his room; that she went, and he then had sexual intercourse with her, getting her with child. If this story is to be believed, the appellee, Solomon White Froman, having been thereafter born within the usual time of gestation, is the child of Solomon Froman. But is the story to be believed? Does not the proof disclose a state of case that utterly repels the truth of this story? Does not the proof show a state of case that repels any presumption of sexual intercourse whatever? We think it does. Let us see. We find that Solomon Froman on the 11th day of November, 1863, was affected with Bright's disease, and dropsy of the bowels, scrotum and thighs. Dr. Griffith attended on him almost daily, and treated him for these diseases, until the 7th day of January, 1864, at which time he turned the case over to Dr. Holloway, and he attended on Froman almost daily, and treated him for these diseases, until his death. Froman continued to grow worse from the time Dr. Griffith commenced attending on him until he died. That his condition may clearly appear, we quote from Dr. Holloway's testimony, which is as follows: "He had edema of the lungs, or asthmatic breathing, and frequent paroxysms of asthma, excessive bronchitis. He had general dropsy. This dropsy was more generally displayed by the accumulation in his abdomen; by enlargement of the skin; by the dropsy of the skin of the abdomen, and the loins, back and thighs; of the skin of the thighs and legs, and by the general excessive accumulation of the fluid in the scrotum, and in the skin of the penis,—so much so that the penis proper could not be seen upon an examination, only the orifice. He had frequent attacks of vomiting and obstinate constipation, with loss of appetite. He was mentally dull, unless when aroused by some special cause of excitement. He had what is called 'hebetudo.' With or without anodynes, he aroused at my visits in a sleepy way in his bed or chair, and had to be questioned before he would give any answer about his case. When aroused by any special cause of excitement, he was more talkative, but con-prove access, or any collateral fact tending to show that he had opportunities of access. Wright v. Holdgate, 3 Car. & K. 180.

The rule precluding the husband or wife from proving non-access for the purpose of bastardizing the issue applies where, on the day following the marriage, the husband abandoned the wife, and the child was born shortly afterward at the house of her employer, whom she sought to charge with the paternity. Tioga Co. v. South Creek Twp. supra; Parker v. Way, 15 N. H. 45; Davis v. Houston, 2 Yemassee, 289; Page v. Dennison, 1 Grant, Can. 577; Dennison v. Page, 20 Pa. 420; State v. Wilson, 10 Ired. L. 121; State v. Herman, 15 Ired. L. 502; 1 Phil. Ev. 57, note.

Evidence of intercourse with other men.

Evidence of intercourse with other men must be limited to a period such as to admit of the inference that the child derived its paternity from that intercourse. Bowen v. Reed, 103 Mass. 48. Compare Paul v. Padelford, 16 Gray, 388.

Evidence that another man had connection with the wife at about the proper time for begetting the child is not competent unless coupled with evidence that the husband had no connection with her at that time. State v. Bennett, 75 N. C. 305.

Evidence of acts of intercourse with other men twelve months before the birth is inadmissible. Robins v. Jones, 119 Mass. 167.

The legal presumption is rebutted by the facts, that the wife led the life of a prostitute, was seen as such in company with other men, that though her husband lived in the same town, he always avoided her, and that the child was born in jail three years after their separation. Sibbet v. Almsley, 3 L. T. N. S. 388.

So illegitimacy is established by evidence of the mother living in adultery at the time when the child was begotten. Barony of Saye and Sele, 1 H. L. Can. 507.

Illegitimacy may be established by proof of other facts.

Illegitimacy may be established by any competent evidence, and proof thereof is not restricted to evidence of impotency on the part of the husband, or of impossibility of access, or of intercourse between the wife and a man other than her husband. Wilson v. Babt, 15 S. C. 88.

Hearsay evidence may be sufficient. Gourman's App. (Pa.) 1 Cent. Rep. 220.

Depositions are admissible on the trial of an issue of bastardy, as in other civil actions. State v. Hickerson, 72 N. C. 481.

The fact of paternity may be established by a fair preponderance of evidence as in other civil cases. People v. Cantino, 1 Brown, N. P. (Mich.) 142; Young v. Makepeace, 103 Mass. 51.

Evidence not admissible on question of paternity.

Declarations of parties made after cohabitation has ceased are not evidence to bastardize the issue. Re Taylor, 9 Paige, 611.

They are not admissible where no evidence is offered of non-access at the time of conception. Dennison v. Page, 20 Pa. 420.

Neither the mother's declarations nor her husband's, she having since deceased, are admissible on the question of paternity (Cope v. Cope, 5 Car. & P. 604, 1 Moody & R. 389; but a baptismal register describing the child as the illegitimate son of his mother is admissible. Ibid.

The father's declarations are insufficient to bastardize the issue of his marriage (Bowles v. Bingham, 3 Munf. 443, 3 Munf. 589; it requires the proof to show it was impossible that the husband could be the child's father. Vernon v. Vernon, 6 La. Ann. 342.

But where non-access has been established by evidence affords, the declaration of the mother is admissible to prove the paternity of the child. Lagre v. Edmonds, 25 L. J. N. S. Ch. 125.

Admissions of the wife cannot be received to establish non-access at the period of conception, to bastardize her issue. Crom v. Crom, 3 Paige, 120.

Evidence of the likeness of a child to its supposed father is not admissible upon the question of paternity. United States v. Collins, 1 Cranch, U. S. 502; Hanawalt v. State, 34 Wis. 84. But consult State v. Bowles, 7 Jones, L. 579.

Nor is evidence of the color of the child's eyes admissible. People v. Carney, 30 Hun, 45.

flood himself to the subject that excited him; and then, when that passed away, he would relapse into his condition of hebetude. His urine was very scant, and when boiled with acetic acid it had the appearance of soiled boiled white of an egg. His case was plainly one of Bright's disease in its advanced stages.

"This was his condition when I saw him in January, 1884. The droptical condition of the penis and scrotum got steadily worse from the first time I saw him, only the orifice of the skin where the penis was could be seen. He could not have had sexual intercourse from the time I saw him in January, 1884. In his physical condition it was not possible for him to have emitted semen into a woman. It was not possible for him to have had connection with a woman at any time during my attendance upon him. The usual period of gestation is from 278 days to 280 days." In his second deposition, he says: "I am satisfied that he was not physically capable of performing the sexual act. I do not think it was possible for him to enter a woman so as to bring the semen in the track in such a manner that the spermatozoa could find their way to the ova. I visited him from the 3d to the 9th of February, excepting the 8th, then from the 10th to the 15th, excepting the 14th. I visited him the 17th, 19th, 20th, 21st, 23d, 25th, 27th and 1st of March, then the 4th and 7th of March, twice that week; then the 11th of March, once that week, then the 16th, 21st, 22d, 23d and 27th of March, then the 31st of March and 5th and 11th of April, then the 16th and 19th of April, then 22d and 27th of April and 3d of May, 6th of May and 10th of May. Then I visited him on the 11th, 13th, 14th, 15th, 16th of May, and the 19th, 20th, 21st, 22d, 23d, and on the 24th, twice on the 25th; to the 31st, inclusive, twice every day; twice on the 1st of June; and twice on the 3d of June, the day of his death."

From what Dr. Holloway says, it was a physical impossibility for Solomon Froman to get his wife with child at the respective dates that he visited him. Is it possible that the swelling could have abated between the 31st of March and the 8th of April enough to enable him to have sexual intercourse at any time during said period? It may be possible, but it seems to us that such a conclusion is wholly irrational. The doctor, in his almost daily visits before and after said time, found him so swollen as to be incapable of performing the sexual act, and growing worse all the time. So it seems that there is no ground whatever for forming any rational conclusion that the swelling so abated within said time as to enable him to have had sexual intercourse. Such a conclusion would be wholly irrational. But we are not left to conjecture about this matter; for the nurse, who was in daily attendance upon Solomon Froman, and slept with him nightly, during said time, says that his swelling did not abate, nor did his condition at all improve. He also says that he knows Solomon Froman did not have sexual intercourse with Mrs. Froman on the morning of the 3d of April, nor at any other time for several months previous. It also appears that Solomon and Mrs. Froman lived like cats and dogs for several months prior to her leaving his house on the 4th of April; that he usually spoke of her as "the damned dirty bitch," and she of him as "the damned old son of a bitch." He accused her of poisoning him, and she said that she had poisoned him in order to get him out of the way. She also said, time and again, he could not, even before he was taken sick, have sexual intercourse; that she and he had ceased, for at least a year before his death, to have intercourse with each other. He said the same thing. It also appears from the proof that she had sexual intercourse with Ed Ward in Bowling Green, on the night of the 4th of April, and several other times during her stay in that city, and afterwards with another. It also appears that during her marriage state, before and after her sojourn in Bowling Green, she wrote this Ed Ward unchaste and lascivious letters. The appellee did introduce proof to the effect that, in April and May, Solomon Froman was seen going about his business, and that no swelling was observed, and, from the way that he handled himself, no unusual swelling existed. These witnesses might be mistaken as to the time. Their recollection may be explained upon the ground of mistake as to time; but these doctors and nurses had reason to fix and recollect the time. There is scarcely any room for an honest mistake. Their story is either true, at least as to the swollen condition of this man, or it is a fabrication. From the high character of the physicians, and the apparent honesty of the nurses, the latter fact is wholly improbable.

But it is contended that the proof of the conduct of Mr. and Mrs. Froman towards each other; their expressions of hatred and fear of each other; their statements during the time that they lived together, apparently, as husband and wife, as to non-access,—are incompetent as tending to show non-access. It is also contended that, where parties have opportunities of access,—sexual intercourse,—the child begotten in wedlock is conclusively presumed to be legitimate. We do not so understand the law as to either proposition. We understand the law to be that where the husband and wife have opportunities of access, there arises a very strong presumption that they did have it; but this presumption may be overcome by clear proof to the contrary, which may consist of proof that the husband was incompetent to have sexual intercourse, or from some cause he had declined to have sexual intercourse with his wife, or she with him. If such proof of conduct, declarations, etc., were not admitted as proof, it would be almost impossible to prove that the husband and wife had declined to have sexual intercourse with each other. It is a fact that husbands and wives, though living in the same house or on the same farm, have often so lived, not as husband and wife, but in fact in a state of separation; so, in the absence of proof of constant watch over them, night and day, it would be impossible to prove non-access, unless the proof of conduct, declarations, etc., were admitted as evidence.

It is also contended that the proof of adultery on the part of the wife was incompetent. Where access is either expressly or impliedly admitted, such proof is ordinarily inadmissible, unless it is such proof as unquestionably es-tablisthes the fact of illegitimacy; as that of the adulterous intercourse by a white woman, having a white husband, with a negro, and the child born in the usual course of time thereafter was a negro. But where proof shows that the husband is not capable of performing the sexual act, or that the parties have abstained from performing the sexual act, then it is competent to prove adultery on the part of the wife as corroborating the main fact. If Mrs. Froman was shown to be, in fact, a virtuous woman, such fact would create the belief that there was some mistake or false swearing in reference to the incompetency or non-access of her husband, or else incline the chancellor to adopt the theory of the expert physicians, to the effect that though, from the swollen condition of Froman, he could not enter Mrs. Froman's person, yet in his effort to make the entry, his semen found its way into the vagina, and the appellee Solomon White Froman was the fruit. But the proof of her adultery drives away these conjectures and strained theories, made in behalf of chastity, and corroborates the proof of non access.

We do not understand that, where the husband's access is either expressly or impliedly admitted or proven about the time the child is begotten, the child's legitimacy is in all such cases conclusive. The presumption, in such cases, is only conclusive where proof may be introduced, pro and con, as to the question of legitimacy. No probabilities can be weighed and considered. The fact of illegitimacy in such case cannot be established by the weight of evidence. Nothing short of some fact thoroughly established, and which, when established, cannot be explained away, as the case just mentioned of a white woman having a negro child, will be allowed to prevail against the presumption. The proof of the illegitimacy of the child, begotten in wedlock, is a direct attack upon the mother's virtue, and an accusation of a wanton violation of her marriage vows, and is a stigma upon the child, and taints its blood, if the charge be true. Therefore, to hold that the mother, thus assailed, could not support her own innocence and honor, and the purity of the blood of her child, by her oath that she was true to herself and offspring by keeping sacred what is enjoined by both divine and human law, and upon the keeping of which the refinement and elevation of the race depend, would be a harsh rule indeed. But, while she is allowed to do this, and in dubious cases she should do this, she should not, upon cross-examination, be allowed to withhold any part of the truth. The whole truth should come, although she would have to disclose acts of adultery.

The General Statutes provide, in substance, that if the wife voluntarily leaves her husband, and lives in adultery, she shall forfeit her right of dower and distributable share in the husband's real and personal estate. This Statute does not mean that she shall constantly live with one man in adultery during her abandonment of the husband, in order to forfeit her right of dower or distributable share; but if she admits any man or men to her periodically, or whenever it is convenient or opportunity is afforded, during said abandonment, such conduct constitutes a living in adultery, within the meaning of the Statute. It is clear from the proof in the cause, that Mrs. Froman's conduct was as above described, in consequence of which she forfeited her right to dower and distributable share in Solomon Froman's estate.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to deny Solomon White Froman any interest whatever in Solomon Froman's estate, and to deny Mrs. Froman any dower or distributable share in said estate, and for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Petition for rehearing overruled.

TERRITORY of Washington, as rel. George O. KELLY, Appl.,

v.

J. P. STEWART et al.

(.....Wash.....)

A statute authorizing the creation of a municipal corporation by a judicial court, upon petition of a majority of the inhabitants of the territory to be incorporated, is unconstitutional as delegating legislative functions to the court.

(February 12, 1890.)

A PPEAL by relator from a judgment of the District Court for Pierce County sustaining a demurrer to the complaint in a proceeding to determine by what authority defendants claimed to exercise the powers of trustees of a certain municipal corporation and to dissolve such corporation. Reversed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Fremont Campbell, Pro. Atty., C. H. Hanford and Thomas Carroll, for appellant:

Section 1889 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, together with chap. 168, p. 101, 24 United States Statutes at Large, of Congress, Second Session, conferring upon the Legislature the right to create municipal corporations, does not contemplate or permit the Legislature to delegate such right to courts or judges.

Act of Territorial Legislature approved February 9, 1888, does not delegate legislative authority to the courts, as the Legislature by that Act prescribes the liabilities, duties, powers and privileges of said corporations, and the Statute, and not the court, determines the extent and nature of the powers of the corporation.

The Act is not unconstitutional because of certain powers and duties conferred upon the courts in relation to the mode of organizing said towns, as these duties are judicial in their nature, and the Legislature, and not the court, prescribes the powers, duties and liabilities of which the corporation is possessed.

Anders, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought in the District Court of the Second Judicial District of Washington Territory, holding terms at Tacoma, in and for Pierce County, to inquire and determine by what warrant or authority the appellees claim to exercise the powers of a board of trustees of the Town of Puyallup, in that county, and to oust them from office as such board of trustees, and to dissolve said municipal corporation. The complaint states: "(1) That the above-named defendants, as a place called 'Puyallup,' in Pierce County, Wash. T., do now unlawfully act as a municipal corporation under the name and style of the 'Town of Puyallup,' without being legally incorporated as a board of trustees of said alleged municipal corporation. (2) That said defendants act as such corporation, and exercise the powers of such board of trustees, under color of authority conferred by an order made by the judge of this court, at chambers, in the City of Tacoma, Wash. T., on the 31st day of July, A. D. 1888, and entered upon record in this court. (3) That a certified copy of the record of said order, and of the proceedings in the matter relating to the alleged incorporation of said Town of Puyallup, marked 'Exhibit A,' is hereto annexed for reference, and made a part of this complaint, and a correct plat, showing the boundaries of said alleged incorporated Town of Puyallup, as defined in said order, and the location of the relator's farm, hereinafter mentioned, marked 'Exhibit B,' is hereto annexed for reference, and made a part of this complaint. (4) That said order is void, and of no effect; for the same was made by the judge, aforesaid, upon the ex parte application of John Beverly, Esq., without a hearing being granted to the relator, or to any of the inhabitants, or owners of property, within the boundaries of said alleged Town of Puyallup, and without any notice being given of said application; and no opportunity was at any time given to the relator, or any other person whomsoever, to remonstrate against or oppose the incorporation of said town, or to question the validity or sufficiency of the petition upon which said order was made, or to make complaint as to the boundaries of said alleged town, and no legal or good evidence was produced before the judge upon which to base the findings of fact recited in said order; and power to make said order is not judicial, and not vested in said judge by law. (5) That the relator is the owner of real property situated within the boundaries of said alleged town, as defined by said order; and he and many others, owners of property situated within said alleged town, have not consented to the incorporation of said town, and are unwilling to have said town incorporated with boundaries including their said property, for that said property is partly improved and cultivated farming land, and no part thereof is platted into town lots and streets; and they are unwilling to consent to the laying out of and extending streets across their said land, or to tax on of said land, by such alleged municipal corporation."

To this complaint the defendants demurred for the alleged reason that the same did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The district court sustained the demurrer, and caused judgment for costs to be entered against the plaintiff.

From this judgment plaintiff appeals to this court; and we are called upon to determine the question of the legal existence of the Town of Puyallup, which also involves the validity of the Act of the Legislature approved February 9, 1888, entitled "An Act for the Incorporation of Towns and Villages," the first section of which, so far as is material to this case, is as follows: "Where a majority of the taxable inhabitants of any town or village within this Territory present a petition to the judge of the district court, having jurisdiction of real actions in such county, setting forth the metes and bounds of such town or village, together with the adjacent bounds, in all not exceeding in area one square mile, which they desire to include therein, and praying that they may be incorporated, and police established for their local government, and the judge of the district court shall be satisfied that a majority of the taxable inhabitants of such town or village, as shown by the last assessment roll of said county, shall have signed such petition, such judge of the district court shall cause such petition to be entered in full on the records of such court, together with the names of the petitioners, and shall thereupon make and record an order declaring such town or village duly incorporated, designating in such order the metes and bounds thereof, and the name of such town or village, and thenceforward the inhabitants within such metes and bounds are a body politic and corporate."

The proceedings for incorporating the town were inaugurated by the presentation to the judge of the district court, by one John Beverly, of a petition signed by sixty-three persons therein, representing themselves to be a majority of the taxable inhabitants of the Town of Puyallup, praying that they might be incorporated under the name of the "Town of Puyallup," and police established for their local government, and that trustees be appointed for the government of said town. The petition also specified and defined the metes and bounds of the proposed territory to be incorporated, and alleged the area thereof to be in all not exceeding one square mile. On the 31st day of July, 1888, the judge of the district court, at chambers, in the City of Tacoma, in Pierce County, in response to the prayer of the petition, made and entered of record an order declaring the Town of Puyallup to be duly incorporated under and by virtue of the laws of Washington Territory, and in said order appointed defendants as a board of trustees of the town, in accordance with section 2 of the Incorporation Act.

It is admitted by the demurrer, and was conceded by counsel on the argument of this case, that the relator is the owner of real property situated within the boundaries of the territory described in the petition, and defined by order of the court; that he did not consent to the incorporation of the town; that he was unwilling to have it incorporated with boundaries including his property; that his said real estate is partly improved and cultivated farming land, not platted into town lots and streets, and that he is unwilling to consent to the laying out of and extending streets across the same; that he is unwilling to submit to taxation of his land by said municipal corporation, that no notice of the presentation of the petition was given; and that the relator had no opportunity to be heard, or to remonstrate against, or oppose the incorporation of the town, or to question the validity of the order of the judge, or to make complaint as to the boundaries of the proposed municipal corporation.

The proceedings are assailed by appellant as not being in accordance with the law relating thereto. He objects that the petition is defective in not stating that the signers thereof were a majority of the taxable inhabitants of the town, according to the last assessment roll of the county, and that the order of the judge was made upon the certificate of the county assessor who is not empowered by any law to so certify; that there was no evidence before the judge or court to warrant the order; and that the order was made without jurisdiction of the subject matter by the court. As the law requires that the petition to be presented to the judge shall be signed by a majority of the taxable inhabitants of the town or village to be incorporated, and that the judge shall be satisfied, in some way not specified by law, that a majority of the taxable inhabitants of the town or village, as shown by the last assessment roll of the county, shall have signed the petition, it is quite doubtful whether an omission to state in the petition that the petitioners are a majority of the taxable inhabitants as shown by the last assessment roll of the county, is not a matter substantially affecting the subsequent proceedings. But, however this may be, we are not disposed to hold the incorporation invalid on that account, but will assume that the law was substantially complied with.

We now come to the consideration of validity of the law itself. The object of the Act of the Legislature was the incorporation of towns and villages, as expressed in the title, and, as the meaning of the expression "towns and villages" is not defined by the law, we must presume that the words were intended to be used in their ordinary acceptation, as meaning an aggregation of houses and inhabitants more or less compact. The word "town" was originally from the Anglo-Saxon word "tun," an inclosure, and meant a collection of houses inclosed by a wall. Anderson, Law Dict. title Town.

"The fundamental idea of a municipal corporation proper, both in England and in this country, is to invest compact or dense populations with the power of local self-government. Indeed, the necessity for such corporations springs from the existence of centers or agglomerations of population, having, by reason of density and numbers, local or peculiar interests and wants, not common to adjoining sparsely settled or agricultural regions. It is necessary to draw the line which separates the limits of the place and people to be incorporated. This is, with us, a legislative function." 1 Dillon, Mun. Corp. 3d ed § 183.

In England, this power was formerly given by a royal grant or charter, presumably at the request of the municipalities themselves, but in this country municipal corporations are purely the creatures of statutes. "They possess no powers or faculties not conferred upon them, either expressly or by fair implication, by the law which creates them, or other statutes applicable to them." Id. § 21.

It being conceded that the power to create municipal corporations is vested exclusively in the Legislature, the question arises, Can this power be delegated; and, if so, to whom, or to what agencies? Counsel on both sides agree that the Legislature may delegate its functions in some measure; but they disagree as to the legislative power to carry the principle to the extent attempted in the Act in question. On the one side, it is contended that the Act approved February 2, 1888, does not in fact delegate legislative authority to the courts; that the Statute, and not the court, determines the extent and nature of the powers of the corporation, that a statute may be valid, though its taking effect may depend on some subsequent event, and that the powers and duties of the courts in relation to the mode of organizing towns are judicial in their nature; that the Legislature, and not the court, prescribes the powers, duties and liabilities of the corporation,—and, on the other, it is urged that the law of Congress conferring upon the Territorial Legislature the right to create municipal corporations does not permit the Legislature to delegate such right to the courts or judges, that the law is mandatory upon the court, is against public policy and authorizes the taking of property without due process of law, and without notice or opportunity to be heard, and that the including of farming land in incorporated towns is unreasonable and unjust.

The incorporation of towns by general statutory law is a departure from original methods, and is of comparatively modern date, and it would naturally be expected that the procedure for their organization by this means would not be uniform throughout the different States of the Union. It would be practically impossible for the Legislature, by a general law, to fix and define the boundaries of every municipal corporation that might be organized under it; and that question is therefore determined in some other way, designated by the general law of the particular jurisdiction. But the authority to incorporate, with us as in England, has been restricted to cases in which compact communities already exist who desire to assume a corporate character, and have police established for their local government. Id. § 183. But, unless specially restrained by constitutional provisions, the Legislature may delegate the power to determine the territorial limits of the municipal corporation, and thereby settle what property and persons will be subject to municipal control, to appropriate local bodies or boards of officers. 1 Dillon, Mun. Corp. supra; People v. Bennett, 28 Mich. 431.

It would hardly seem probable that the Legislature, while professing to pass a law for the incorporation of "towns and villages", really intended to include therein rural districts or farming lands not platted or laid out in lots or blocks, especially against the will of the owner of such property; and yet the Statute, by its terms, covers and includes just such cases; and we do not feel at liberty to construe it otherwise.

We entirely agree with the learned judge who decided the case of People v. Bennett, when he says that "there are few, if any, acts of state, bearing upon individuals, more important than those which determine their liberty to be included in particular municipalities, and the cases are very rare in which they have not been allowed an opportunity of being heard in every step of the proceedings." And, where the individual has not expressly assented, or impliedly done so, by settling and remaining in a dense community needing corporate powers and privileges, it seems too plain for argument that he should at least be accorded a hearing before being compelled to subject himself or his property to the dominion of a municipality with whose interests he has nothing in common. This view of the law was adopted in the case of People v. Bennett, above cited.

In the case of Borough of Blooming Valley, 80 Pa. 88, it was held that farming land might be included in the limits of a municipal corporation by consent of the owner, but not otherwise.

And in Borough of Little Meadows, 28 Pa. 266, it was held that the community proposing to be incorporated was too sparse to be called a "village", within the meaning of the law.

On the contrary, it has been held in New Hampshire, with equally good reason, that the selectmen of a town, in defining the boundaries of a village, could not exclude any part of it, but must include the whole within the village limits. Osgood v. Clark, 20 N. H. 807.

Appellees contend, as before intimated, that a statute may be conditional, and its taking effect made to depend upon some subsequent event; and, to a certain extent, the principle is recognized by the courts. As an illustration, the Legislature may enact a general statute for the formation of private corporations; and its taking effect, as to any particular corporation, may depend upon the assent of the parties interested. They may withhold their assent at pleasure, but cannot be forced to become incorporators. If they accept the terms and provisions of the law they are presumed to be benefited thereby; but, if they reject, they cannot be injured.

While a statute may be conditional, and only take effect upon the happening of a future event, we hold that the place where it is to operate, its "situs," must be fixed definitely by the Legislature itself, or delegated to some body or agency capable of exercising legislative functions, and not left to the will or caprice of localities to determine whether it shall be applicable to their particular community or not. Local Option Laws have been sustained by some courts, but the place where they were to take effect has always been defined by law, and not left conditioned upon the discretion of the people of any and every locality in the State.

To sustain the position of appellees, counsel cite the case of Burlington v. Lebrick, 48 Iowa, 252. The question there was as to the power of the City of Burlington to enlarge its limits by extending its boundaries over contiguous territory; and the court held that the law authorizing a petition for the purpose by the city council, to be presented to, and acted upon by, the circuit judge, and issues to be found and tried as in other proceedings, was not invalid as an unwarranted delegation of legislative power, basing the opinion on the ground that the determination of the issue by the court was a judicial act,—a mere ascertaining of the condition upon which the law might take effect. But in delivering the opinion the court used the following language: "Nor is it proper to designate the thing to be accomplished by this Statute as the creation of a corporation. A corporation is an artificial being clothed with certain powers. In the present case, such a corporation exists, known as the 'City of Burlington.' When the Act sought in this petition is accomplished, no new corporation will have been created." From this language we might infer that, had the question before the court been that of the formation of a municipal corporation, the decision might have been different.

In the case of Kaper v. Bremen, 16 Mo. 88, the incorporation of a town by the county court, in pursuance of a general statute, was upheld on the ground that the court acted judicially, and had no discretion, and no authority to vest any power in the corporation.

And in the case of Morristown v. Shelton, 1 Head (Tenn.), 24, a law substantially like the one under consideration in this case was held valid and constitutional for the reason that no legislative power was delegated to or exercised by the court. This last decision, however, was under a Constitution which provided that "the Legislature shall have power to grant such charters of incorporation as they may deem expedient for the public good." We do not feel bound by the decisions in these cases. If the court in either of the cases acted judicially in the matter before it, then, certainly, it should have had a right or "discretion" to exercise its judgment. If its action was not judicial, then, surely, it must have been a delegated legislative power which it exercised. Counsel for appellees also cite the case of Blanchard v. Bissell, 11 Ohio St. 96. The controversy in that case was as to the validity of the Statute in relation to the annexation of territory to cities; and it was claimed by Bissell, in a proceeding to enjoin the collection of certain taxes levied upon his property by the city council, that the order of the county commissioners for the annexation of the district embracing his property was void because it included his property with that of others, without his consent, and against his remonstrance. The court sustained the law on the ground that the county commissioners were properly clothed with power to do the acts objected to. Each party was entitled to a hearing under that Statute, and the commissioners were empowered to order the annexation or not, as they might deem reasonable and proper. We agree with that decision; and, if our Statute were like the one upon which it was based, it would be stripped of its most objectionable features.

In the late case of People v. Fleming, 10 Colo. 558, the Supreme Court of Colorado held that a law which provides that when the inhabitants of any part of the county not embraced within the limits of any city or incorporated town desire to be organized into a city or incorporated town, they may apply by petition to the county court, and providing, also, for the manner of procedure in the organization of such contemplated town or city, was not in conflict with the Constitution. The decision in that case seems to have been based upon the broad ground that the Legislature, if not expressly prohibited by the Constitution, may delegate the power to form municipal corporations to unorganized private individuals; in other words, to the people themselves. We cannot consent to follow the reasoning in that case, or to concur in the conclusion reached by the learned court. We think the better doctrine is that laid down by Judge Cooley in his work on Constitutional Limitations, 4th ed. 145, 146, which is as follows: "The prevailing doctrine in the courts appears to be that, except in those cases where, by the Constitution, the people have expressly reserved to themselves a power of decision, the function of legislation cannot be exercised by them even to the extent of accepting or rejecting a law which has been framed for their consideration." But we would not be understood as holding that the Legislature could not delegate the power to put the machinery of municipal corporations in motion to courts which are not purely legal tribunals. The Courts of Quarter Sessions of Pennsylvania, and the County Courts of Oregon, and perhaps of other States, are vested with administrative, and, in a measure, representative, powers; and they are properly intrusted with the functions attempted by our late Territorial Legislature, by the law in question, to be imposed upon the district judge.

We hold that a judicial court cannot exercise legislative functions, and that the Legislature cannot impose such power upon it. People v. Bennett, supra; People v. Nevada, 6 Cal. 143; Galeburg v. Hawkinson, 75 Ill. 158; People v. Carpenter, 24 N. Y. 69.

Owing to the importance of this case, we have given it all the consideration in our power, under the circumstances; and we have been greatly aided in our labors by the learning and diligence of counsel on both sides. And we are constrained to hold that the Statute under which the Town of Puyallup was organized is invalid, and cannot be sustained. The cause will therefore be remanded to the court below, with directions to overrule the demurrer, and to proceed in accordance with this opinion. And it is so ordered.

Stiles, Hoyt and Scott, JJ., concur.

Dunbar, J.:

I concur in the result, because I do not think that the petition was sufficient; but I cannot concur in the opinion that the Act of the Legislature was unconstitutional.

BARBER ASPHALT PAVING CO., Resp.,
v.

Mary G. HUNT, Appt.

(.....Mo.....)

1. It will be presumed that an ordinance was properly signed by the Speaker of the House of Delegates, where the journal recites that his signature was affixed in open session, and no objection is noted on the journal although it does not expressly recite that all the matters of detail were complied with, and the charter of the city provides that it shall be signed in open session, and that before the officer's signature is affixed "he shall suspend all other business, declaring that such bill will now be read."

2. The adjournment of the House of Delegates on the day bills are presented to the mayor for his approval will not prevent them from becoming valid ordinances, if duly filed by the mayor, with his approval, in the city register's office, although the charter of the city provides that every bill shall become an ordinance when "returned within ten days to the House in which the same originated, with the approval of the mayor."

2. The facts that the work of street paving prescribed by an ordinance is covered by letters-patent, under which the exclusive right is held by one company, and therefore that no competition for the work is possible, will not prevent letting a contract for the work under a charter providing that such contracts shall be let to the lowest responsible bidder.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for the City of St. Louis in favor of plaintiff in an action to enforce payment of certain special tax bills issued to plaintiff by the City of St. Louis in payment for work done upon certain streets. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

The Legislature must be in session when a bill is presented to the governor, and when it is returned by him to the House.

Messrs. Hitchcock, Madill & Finkelnburg for respondent.

Sherwood, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The grounds upon which the defendant resists the payment of the tax bills in suit are two: first, that the ordinances in question were not passed and approved as required by the charter; and, second, that the work provided for in the ordinances was not let as provided in § 27, art. 3, of the charter.

The charter provisions in respect to passing ordinances (art. 3, § 23) are as follows: "No bill shall become an ordinance until the same shall have been signed by the presiding officer of each of the two Houses, in open session; and, before such officer shall affix his signature to any bill, he shall suspend all other business, declare that such bill will now be read, and that if no objections be made, he will sign the same, to the end that it may become an ordinance. The bill shall then be read at length, and, if no objection be made, he shall, in the presence of the House, in open session, and before any other business is entertained, affix his signature, which fact shall be noted on the journal, and the bill immediately sent to the other House." 2 Rev. Stat. 1879, p. 1584.

Defendant put in evidence the journal of the House of Delegates for March 20, 1883, which, after giving in full the report of the proper committee that these two bills were truly enrolled, proceeds as follows: "The bills, as above, were read at length. No objection being made, Mr. Speaker Harriot, in the presence of the House, in open session, affixed his signature thereto, as required by the charter."

Upon this fact being thus shown by the journal, the defendant contends that the charter provisions marked above in italics were not complied with, and therefore the ordinance passed is null. These provisions of the charter are copied from section 37, art. 4, of our State Constitution; and upon that section it has been ruled that a bill passed by the Legislature became a law where the same was signed by the presiding officer of each of the two Houses in open session; that this provision was mandatory, but the other provisions, relating to mere matters of detail, were but directory; and, as no objection was noted on the journal, the presumption would be indulged that the matters of detail were complied with; that the Legislature proceeded by right, and not by wrong. State v. Mead, 71 Mo. 266.

Here the journal expressly recites that the signature of the speaker of the House was affixed in open session. On the authority of the case cited, it must be ruled that the bills in question become ordinances, as against the objection already considered.

But it is urged that the bills failed to become laws, because never returned to the House in which they originated. Section 23 of art. 3 of the charter provides: "Every bill presented to the mayor, and returned within ten days to the House in which the same originated, with the approval of the mayor, shall become an ordinance."

The testimony shows the bills, though signed by the mayor, were not thus returned, both Houses having adjourned March 27, 1883, sine die,—the day on which the bills were presented to the mayor for his approval. But the testimony also shows that the mayor on the same day filed the bills in the city register's office on the day of their approval.

Section 23 of art. 3 of the charter contemplates that cases will arise where a bill shall not have been returned to the House where the same originates, and, besides, there is no provision in the charter that "no bill shall become an ordinance," which shall not be returned by the mayor to the House where the same originated. The same considerations, therefore, apply here as were applied in Ward's Case, supra; and we hold the ordinance as valid, as against this objection also.

Section 27 of article 6 provides how bids for work shall be awarded, to wit, that the board of public improvements shall "let out said work by contract to the lowest responsible bidder, subject to the approval of the council." Upon this point it is insisted that such provision was violated, because the work of street paving prescribed by the ordinances was covered by letters patent, under which plaintiff held the exclusive right, and therefore there was no competition for said work. This point, though adjudicated in other jurisdictions, is a case of first impression in this State. In New York it has been ruled, under a statute requiring all city work to be let "to the lowest bidder," that the common council were not prohibited from letting a contract for paving a street with material or in a manner not admitting competitive bids or proposals. Re Dugro, 50 N. Y. 518.

This ruling was approvingly followed in Baird v. New York, 96 N. Y. 567.

Prior to the time the subject was discussed in New York, a similar ruling had been made in Michigan. Hobart v. Detroit, 17 Mich. 246.

These cases seem to us to rest upon the correct basis. It certainly was never intended that the city authorities should be unable to make a contract, however necessary to the public welfare such contract might be, if the article desired, or the manner of the performance of the contract required the use of a patented article. Such a construction of the charter we regard as "sticking in the bark," and as subordinating the whole powers conferred on the common council to the meaning of two or three words contained in a single section of the charter. Besides, the rights of those interested are protected by the necessity of obtaining the approval of the council to any contract. A different view of the matter under discussion has been taken in Wisconsin (Dean v. Charlton, 28 Wis. 590), but by a divided court; and it is noteworthy that the Legislature of that State did not approve the view of the statute taken by the court, and so changed the statute, so as to prevent the continued prevalence of the objectionable ruling. Mills v. Charleton, 29 Wis. 400; Dean v. Borchsenius, 30 Wis. 239.

For these reasons we affirm the judgment.

All concur, but Barclay, J., not sitting.

Mary J. TOWNSHEND

v.

George H. GRAY et al., Censors of the Vermont State Eclectic Medical Society.

(..... Vt.)

1. No power to confer the degree of M. D., or any other degree, is given to a corporation by the general law of a State authorizing incorporation for the purpose of maintaining a literary and scientific institution.

2. A diploma from an institution having no power to give it is not sufficient to entitle a person to demand a license as physician from the censors of a medical society under Rev. Laws, § 8011.

(April 5, 1890.)

PETITION for a writ of mandamus to compel defendants to issue to complainant a certificate authorizing her to practice medicine within the State. Dismissed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. C. Baker for complainant.

Mr. A. H. Huse for defendants.

Powers, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a petition by the complainant, claiming to be a graduate of the Vermont Medical College, and holding a diploma of that college conferring upon her the degree of M. D., against the defendants, who are the censors of the Vermont State Eclectic Medical Society, praying that a writ of mandamus be issued commanding the defendants, as such censors, to issue to the complainant a certificate authorizing her to practice medicine in this State.

Our Statute provides that every medical society chartered by the Legislature "shall issue certificates to physicians and surgeons who furnish evidence by diploma from a medical college or university, or by certificate of examination by an authorized board, which satisfies said censors that the person presenting such credentials has been, after due examination, deemed qualified to practice the branches mentioned in such diploma or certificate." The case shows that the complainant presented to the defendants, as such censors, her diploma aforesaid, and the defendants refused to issue the certificate above referred to on the ground that the Vermont Medical College had no legal power to issue a diploma conferring the degree of M. D., and so the complainant had not shown credentials entitling her to a license to practice medicine.

The main question in issue is whether said medical college has the power to issue diplomas which entitle the holder to the license provided for in the Statute. Without going into the question at length, touching the power conferred by the Statute upon the censors, which has been discussed in argument, it is plain that this board has the power to decide in the first instance whether a diploma presented to it as evidence of the holder's right to a license is a genuine or spurious document. So far, at least, the board may sit in judgment upon a diploma; and in this case the board adjudged that this diploma did not have such legal efficacy, as evidence, as would warrant the issue of a license.

The Vermont Medical College was organized under the provisions of the 10th subdivision of § 3864, Rev. Laws. That section provides that "persons may associate together and have the powers of a corporation for either of the following purposes: . . . (10) To establish and maintain literary and scientific institutions."

Later sections in the same chapter enumerate the powers which such associations may have, namely: may have a corporate name, a corporate seal; may adopt by-laws; may sue and be sued; purchase and hold real estate; may raise money, and divide their capital stock into shares.

Under this subdivision, it is argued that a medical college may be organized with the power to confer the degree of M. D. It is fundamental that a corporation has such power only as is conferred by its charter, with such incidental powers as are necessary to enable it to exercise its chartered power. No express power to confer degrees can be found in the Statute under which this medical college was organized, and hence the power to confer degrees must be classed as incidental to the general powers of a corporation formed for the purpose of maintaining a literary or scientific institution, if it exists at all. It would hardly do to say that literary or scientific institutions have such power upon any theory that without it they cannot answer the ends of their creation. The degree of M. D. is something more than a mere honorary title. It is a certificate attesting the fact that the person upon whom it has been conferred has successfully mastered the curriculum of study prescribed by the authorities of an institution created by law, and by law authorized to issue such certificate. It thus has a legal sanction and authority. But it has more. In practical affairs, it introduces its possessor to the confidence and patronage of the general public. Its legal character gives it a moral and material credit in the estimation of the world, and makes it thereby a valuable property right of great pecuniary value.

The scope of subdivision 10 of the Statute in question may be discovered by looking at the other subdivisions of the same section. These provide for the organization of literary associations; bands of music, associations for breeding fish, for bringing to justice thieves and burglars, building meeting houses, securing burial grounds, etc. The articles of association are to be filed in the town clerk's office, in the town where the association is organized. All this points to association of limited and local scope. The filing of the articles of association, which constitute the charter under which the association proceeds with its work, in the town clerk's office, indicates that the Legislature did not regard such associations as having powers, the exercise of which concerned the general public. The power to confer degrees, not being conferred explicitly by the Statute, and not being necessary to enable a literary or scientific institution to carry forward studies of a literary or scientific character, clearly does not exist at all. Philadelphia Medical College Case, 3 Whart. 445.

It is no more appropriate to say that a literary or scientific institution, without special statutory power, can confer the degree of M. D., than to say that it may confer the degree of LL. D. or D. D. or A. B.; for it is plain that law schools, theological schools, universities and colleges can be organized under this subdivision equally well with medical schools. Every State in the Union has chartered these institutions, and it is believed that none of them has ever supposed that, with all the widely enumerated powers delegated to them, it had the power to confer degrees of any kind unless such power was expressly conferred in its charter. In the case of the Castleton Medical School, chartered many years ago, the charter at first granted contained no delegation of power to confer degrees, but at the next session of the Legislature it was amended by an Act giving such power. Such has, manifestly, been the legislative idea respecting the necessity of special authority from the law-making power of the government touching the right to confer degrees; and construing this General Statute, providing for the organization, by voluntary association, of persons for local and comparatively unimportant purposes, in the light of the common usages and common understanding of people respecting the rights, privileges and emoluments universally accorded to persons upon whom degrees have been conferred, we are clearly of the opinion that the Vermont Medical College has no power, under its articles of association, to confer degrees of any kind. To hold that the Legislature, by a general law, intended that any three men in any town of the State, however illiterate or irresponsible, might organize and flood the State with doctors of medicine, doctors of law, doctors of divinity, masters of arts, civil engineers and all the other various titles that everywhere in the civilized world have signified high attainments and special equipment for professional work, is to liken it to the witty French minister who threatened to create so many dukes that it would be no honor to be one, and a burning disgrace not to be one.

The complainant, therefore, in submitting her diploma to the board of censors, did not furnish that board any sufficient evidence of qualification that entitled her to the license asked for.

The petition is dismissed, with costs.

Beymour, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from the judgment of the superior court sustaining the defendant's demurrer. The cause of demurrer upon which the issue was found for the defendants alleges that it appears from the contract for a breach of which the suit was brought, that the only agreement made therein was to pay such sum as might be received from a death assessment, and that it is not alleged in the complaint that any such sum was ever received.

To understand the force of this objection and the considerations applicable to it, it is necessary to set out the contract in full. It is as follows:

Certificate No. 446. Benefit $1,000.

Connecticut State Insurance Fund of the Ancient Order of Hibernians of the State of Connecticut.

In consideration of one dollar, initiation fee, and assessments levied from time to time by the directory, Thomas Lawler, of Division No. 2 of Hartford, County of Hartford, State of Connecticut, receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, and the agreement on the part of the said Thomas Lawler to accept the following conditions and rules as a part of this contract between said A. Under a law of a benevolent society, which makes the nonpayment of assessments for a given period after notice operate as a suspension ipso facto of the delinquent member, it is not necessary that the suspension shall be judicially determined by any judicatory of the order. Borgnoff v. Supreme Lodge, K. & L. of H. 5 West. Rep. 92, 22 Mo. App. 127.

The beneficiaries of a member who stands suspended at the time of his death cannot recover on the benefit certificate, upon the ground that the subordinate lodge had continued to treat him as a member, and to treat his unpaid dues to the supreme lodge as dues payable to the subordinate lodge for which it had extended him credit. Ibid.

Assessments on death of members.

Where assessments upon the death of members were ordered by the association, they became due only after proper notice thereof was given to the insured; and the objection that the notice given was insufficient, under the provisions of the by-laws, because it failed to give the lists of deaths as required, and that it did not notify the member of the amount due from him to the benefit fund, was properly sustained, where the defense rested upon a forfeiture to defeat plaintiff's claim. *Miner v. Where, at the time the assessment was laid, the association had money enough in its hands to meet all its obligations, such fact will not render the assessment void. Crossman v. Massachusetts Ben. Assn. 8 New Eng. Rep. 517, 143 Mass. 435.

CONDITIONS.

The conditions upon which this certificate is issued by the fund and accepted by said member, are the following:

First. That the statements and declarations made by and on behalf of said member in his application to become a benefit member of said fund, which are hereby referred to as a basis of this contract, and are a part thereof, and on the faith of which this certificate is issued, are in all respects true, and that no fact has been suppressed relating to his health and circumstances, affecting the interests of said fund or their inducement to accept the risk.

Second. That the said member must be a member in good standing in the order at the time of his death, otherwise this certificate will be null and void.

Third. Any assignment of this certificate shall be void unless assented to in writing by said fund.

Fourth. The death claim under this contract shall be payable in sixty days after satisfactory proof of death of said member shall have been furnished at the office of the secretary of the fund, by the certificate of the attending physician, if there was any, and the full and particular statement of at least one competent and disinterested member of the order, stating the time, place, cause and circumstances of the death of the party.

Fifth. No officers of divisions are authorized to make, alter or discharge contracts or waive forfeitures, and any such act, to be valid, must be done in writing and signed by the president and secretary of the directory.

Sixth. This contract shall be void if the party shall die in or in consequence of a duel, or by the hands of justice, or in the violation of or attempt to violate any criminal law of the United States or of any State or county in which he may be.

Seventh. A failure to comply with the rules of said fund as to payment of assessments, or falling into gross and confirmed habits of intoxication, shall also render the certificate void.

The measure of damages in such a case is the amount assessable upon all the insured, unless it is shown that the amount would be less because all members did not respond to assessments. Bents v. Northwestern Aid Assn. 2 L. R. A. 784, 40 Minn. 322.

Equitable Accident Assn.* 25 Hun, 374, 39 N. Y. S. R. 421.

The corporation cannot resist payment of the death claim upon the ground that the promise to pay within ninety days after proof of death furnished was contingent upon an assessment, as there was an implied obligation on the company to make the necessary assessment, and it could not resist payment by omitting to make it. Freeman v. National Ben. Society, 43 Hun, 322.

The furnishing of proofs of death is a demand for payment and for the company to make the necessary assessment. Ibid.

An action instituted in a court having no jurisdiction of the defendant will not suspend the running of a condition of limitation in a policy of insurance. Keystone Mut. Ben. Assn. v. Norris, 7 Cent. Rep. 304, 115 Pa. 444.

Eighth. This certificate is subject to all rules and regulations that the state convention may, from time to time, adopt for the general advancement and interest of the fund.

RULES.

The rules governing this contract, and which form a part of the same, are as follows:

First. There shall be paid by the member under this contract to the secretary of the fund, on the day of the month in which this contract was made, the sum of one dollar, and he shall not be liable for any further sum except as follows:

Second. Upon the death of any member the said Thomas Lawler shall at once pay, if required, to its secretary, an additional assessment of whatever the directory shall deem necessary.

Third. The form of notice to, and process of collection from, each of the members of the assessment above named, shall be as follows: A notice shall be sent announcing such assessment, and the number thereof, to the last post-office address given to the secretary of the fund by each member, and if the assessment is not received within forty days from the mailing of said notice, it shall be accepted and taken as sufficient evidence that the brother has decided to terminate his connection with the fund, which connection shall thereupon terminate, and the brother's contract with the fund shall lapse and be void; but said brother may again renew his connection with the fund by a new contract, made in the same manner as at first, or, for valid reasons to the officers of the fund (such as a failure to receive notice of an assessment), he may be reinstated by paying assessment arrearages.

Fourth. The above rule governing the collection of assessments for death claims shall also apply to the collection of the annual assessment.

Fifth. Each applicant to become such member must sign the fund's form of application, countersigned by the board of directors of the division of which he is a member.

In witness whereof the said A. O. H. State Insurance Fund hath, by its president and secretary, signed and delivered this certificate at its office, this 13th day of July, 1890.

John D. Cunningham,
Secretary Ins. Fund.
P. J. O'Connor,
Treasurer Ins. Fund.
John P. Murphy,
President Ins. Fund.

Is it true, as claimed by the defendants, and in the sense in which they claim it, that the only agreement contained in the above contract is to pay such sum as might be received from a death assessment? Or, to put it in another form, what does the agreement to pay a sum received from a death assessment imply and involve, when taken in connection with the other provisions of the contract?

The contract is a peculiar one. It is very artificially drawn, and it is undoubtedly difficult to give it a satisfactory construction. Of course it should be so construed as to make its contemplated benefits available, if it can legally be done. And we are, at least, warranted in assuming that the insurers, in accepting the money of the insured, and the insured in paying it, understood that some duty devolved upon the former to secure the promised benefits of the contract to the latter.

In addition to the agreement to pay to Mary Lawler, if living, if not, to the heirs of Thomas, in sixty days after due proof of his death, a sum received from a death assessment, but not to exceed $1,000, the contract further provides that the death claim shall be payable in sixty days after satisfactory proof of such death, except in certain cases not necessary to be stated here, and gives the form of notice and process for collecting the death assessment from each member of the association. Each contract contains, also, a promise by the insured that upon the death of any member he will at once pay, if required, to the secretary, an additional assessment of whatever the directory shall deem necessary—additional as the contract shows to the dollar paid upon becoming a member. This is an agreement by the A. O. H. Insurance Fund to pay the proper person, within sixty days after satisfactory proof of the death of the insured, a sum, not to exceed $1,000, received from a death assessment. The contract contains the agreement of members to pay such assessments and specifies the process by which its collection shall be undertaken—"a notice shall be sent" announcing such assessment, etc. All of which, taken in connection with the other provisions of the contract and the situation and manifest intention of the parties, seems to us to import a promise to make, or cause to be made, the necessary assessment to meet the death claim promised to be paid.

It is well established that whatever is necessary to be done in order to accomplish work specifically contracted to be performed, is part of the contract, though not specified. It is also a principle of general application that whatever may be fairly implied from the terms or language of an instrument is, in judgment of law, contained in it. Overier v. Boston & M. R. Co. 34 N. H. 408; Rogers v. Eneland, 18 Wend. 114.

Addison, in his work on Contracts, § 1400, says: "Although the words of a contract under seal do not in themselves import any express covenant, yet the law, in order to promote good faith and make men act up to the spirit as well as to the letter of their engagements, will create and supply, as a necessary result and consequence of the contract, certain covenants and obligations which bind the parties as forcibly and effectually as if they had been expressed in the strongest and most explicit terms in the deed itself."

In White v. Snell, 5 Pick. 425, an action of assumpsit, the defendant "for value received promised to pay a sum of money, if, and when, he should recover his demands against A." It was held competent for the plaintiff to prove that the defendant had no demands against A, and that so the promise was absolute; or that he had not used due diligence to collect them.

In Savage v. Whitaker, 13 Me. 24, the court says: "An engagement to do a certain thing involves an undertaking to secure and use effectually all the means necessary to accomplish the object."

Marshall, C. J., in Opden v. Saunders, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 341 [6 L. ed. 650], speaking of the power and policy of the law to supply in contracts what in that case is presumed to have been inadvertently omitted by the parties, says that the parties are supposed to have made those stipulations which as honest, fair and just men they ought to have made.

The contract in Frasman v. National Ben. Society, 42 Hun. 258, is, in many respects, similar to the one under consideration. Although the stipulation in that case was to pay a sum "equal to the amount received from a death assessment, but not to exceed $3,000," instead of "a sum received from a death assessment," etc., yet the court held that "the provision in the body of the certificate that payment should be made of a sum equal to the amount received from a death assessment, not to exceed the sum specified, in sixty days after due proof of the death of the member was given, implies an obligation upon the company to proceed and make the necessary assessment to raise the fund within the time during which it was provided that the claim should remain in abeyance."

We conclude, then, that, in connection with the express promises contained in the contract in this case, there is an implied promise to make an assessment to pay the death claim agreed to be paid; an implied promise which the law, "in order to promote good faith and make the parties act up to the spirit as well as to the letter of their engagements, will create and supply as a necessary result and consequence of their contract." The contract to pay a sum received from a death assessment, taken in connection with the other express provisions, involves, in the language of one of the decisions above quoted, an undertaking to secure and use effectually all the means necessary to accomplish the result, and require that an assessment should be made.

In this view of the case the allegation of the demurrer, that "it appears by said contract that the only agreement made therein was to pay such sum as might be received from a death assessment," is not sustained. There was a further agreement, namely, to make such assessment. The complaint alleges that it was not made nor the amount of insurance paid. This cause of demurrer therefore must fail.

It is true that the complaint does not state, in terms, that the defendants agreed to make an assessment, but it sets out the contract in full and alleges as a breach of it, for which it claims damages, that "said assessment has never been made by the defendants."

This method is sanctioned by the Practice Act and the forms and rules given under it. Rule III., § 5, states that it is unnecessary to allege any promise or duty which the law implies from the facts pleaded.

Whatever, therefore, may have been the theory of the plaintiff, inasmuch as the agreement to make the assessment to pay the death claim is implied in the contract, we cannot sustain the demurrer upon this point.

This disposes of the only ground for demurrer specifically decided by the superior court. The defendants, however, insisted, in the argument before us, that the real question is, whether the suit can be maintained at all against these defendants; that it would be unreasonable not to dispose of the whole matter now and here; and that a demurrer goes back and searches out all the errors in the pleadings. Perhaps, in order to determine whether the plaintiff was injured by the decision of the court sustaining the cause of demurrer already disposed of, we ought to pass upon the other causes assigned, for, if the action cannot, in any event, be sustained against the defendants as individuals, the plaintiff has sustained no injury from the decision that the complaint fails to set forth a cause of action against anybody.

Then, too, all the causes for demurrer were argued before us, and the conclusions to which we have come will not make it unjust to the plaintiff to accede to the defendants' claim, and we should decide all the points which were argued.

The defendants assign for further cause for demurrer, that it appears from the contract declared on that the defendants made no personal agreement upon which they were personally liable, but that the contract was signed by them only as officers of the organization mentioned therein. This issue is raised, not as a question of fact, but as a question of law upon the pleadings.

As a matter of law does the contract, upon its face, show that the defendants made no personal contract upon which they were personally liable? The complaint alleges that they were jointly engaged in carrying on life insurance business under the name of the "Connecticut State Insurance Fund," and that they entered into the contract sued upon. If the facts are so should they not be held liable? Does the contract, as a matter of law, preclude that state of facts? If they had simply been sued as individuals, upon a contract headed with the name of the association and signed by them respectively as president, secretary and treasurer, as appears to have been the case in Hitchcock v. Buchanan, 105 U. S. 416 [26 L. ed. 1078], cited by the defendants, and the complaint had contained no allegation that they were carrying on the insurance business under a certain name and made the contract with Thomas Lawler, the question would be a different one, especially if it appeared that the association was incorporated. But under the decision of Darison v. Holden, 55 Conn. 100, 4 New Eng. Rep. 818, the defendants certainly might be liable on a contract signed by them as officers of an organization. If, as the statute permits, the organization consisted simply of individuals united under a distinguishing associate name for business purposes, they did not thereby acquire either corporate power or immunity from individual liability; consequently it could not appear, as a matter of law, from the contract declared on, that the defendants made no personal contract or agreement upon which they were personally liable.

The case of Darison v. Holden was a suit against certain individuals who were in fact the president and secretary of an unincorporated association. This court held that "as a matter of law the plaintiff, in giving credit to the associate name, gave credit to the individuals who upon inquiry should be found to stand behind it." It seems clear, without pursuing the subject further, that this cause for demurrer cannot be sustained. Individual members of an unincorporated association are liable for contracts made in the name of the association, without regard to the question whether they so intended or so understood the law, and even if the other party contracted in form with the association and was ignorant of the names of the individual members composing it. And it is also held in the case just cited that the individual members of such an association do not acquire any immunity from individual liability by force of the statutes which provide that any number of persons associated and known by some distinguishing name may sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, by such name, and that the individual property of the members shall not be liable to attachment or levy of execution in a suit brought against the association.

The remaining causes assigned for the demurrer are that the only breach of the contract alleged in the complaint is that the defendants did not make an assessment, whereas there is no provision in the contract that the defendants or any of them should make any such assessment; and that the complaint alleges that by the contract the death assessment was to be made by the defendants, whereas it appears in the contract that death assessments were to be made by the directory of the association, and it is not alleged that the defendants are members of the directory. The conclusion to which we have already come, that the contract implies a promise that the defendants will make, or cause to be made, an assessment to meet death claims, makes further discussion of these causes unnecessary. We do not concur in the assertion therein made, that death assessments were to be made by the directory. Its duty was the subordinate one of ascertaining the amount necessary to be raised by assessment. This the contract undertakes that it shall do, and that an assessment shall thereupon be made by the insurance fund.

Two other questions were discussed before us, namely, whether, if it should be held that the contract contains an agreement to make an assessment, the plaintiff's remedy is at law, or whether she must first go into a court of equity to compel the defendants to make the assessment; and, if an action at law can be sustained, what is the rule of damages? As to the first, we think an action at law can be sustained. Neither circuity nor multiplication of actions is favored by our practice. If there is a contract to make an assessment, a breach of which is alleged and damages demanded therefor, and a rule of damages can be provided, why should not an action at law be sustained? Both Niblack and Bacon, recent writers upon the subject of Mutual Benefit Societies, after examining a great number of cases, come to the conclusion, with which we fully agree, that the decided weight of authority is to the effect that an action at law will lie for damages for the breach of a contract to make an assessment.

It makes no difference with the questions raised by the demurrer whether substantial or nominal damages can be recovered, for it ought to have been overruled if the plaintiff is entitled to any damages at all. Still the rule of damages applicable to the case was thoroughly argued and both parties invited a decision upon it.

Referring again to the contract, the insurance fund agrees to pay to the proper person, in sixty days after due proof of death, a sum received from a death assessment, but not to exceed $1,000. Each member pays $1 upon joining the association, and agrees, upon the death of any member, to pay at once, if required, an additional assessment of whatever the directory shall deem necessary. Deem necessary for what? Clearly not what it shall deem necessary to pay, leaving the amount discretionary with the directory and to be settled in each individual case as it may deem necessary, but what it shall deem it necessary for the association to raise by assessments in order to pay the $1,000. In short, the contract is to be taken as an agreement to make an assessment which, if duly paid, will raise $1,000, or so much thereof as, in addition to funds on hand, will make that sum. The insured takes the risk of the neglect of members to meet their assessments, and of the consequent reduction of the maximum sum named. One thousand dollars is, prima facie, the value of the policy, and the insurance fund was bound to take all the steps which it contracted to in order to realize that sum. Cases cited by the plaintiff, and other cases which we have examined, fully sustain this conclusion. And the rule is a fair one, because it is always within the power of the association to live up to its contract, and thus fix the sum which a death assessment will bring.

In Elkhart Mut. Aid. B. & R. Assn. v. Houchton, 108 Ind. 286, 1 West. Rep. 234, the certificate entitled the beneficiary to $1,000, or so much thereof as might be realized from one assessment. The complaint alleged the death of the beneficiary, proof of his death duly given, and the refusal of the defendant to pay the amount named in the certificate or any part thereof, and its refusal to order or make any assessment to raise the required sum or any part of it. The defendant was held liable for the maximum amount, it not being shown in defense that an assessment would not produce the full amount of the certificate. It was assumed that it was the duty of the defendant to make an assessment, though the contract contained no express agreement to that effect. Karnshaw v. Sun Mut. Aid Society, 68 Md. 467, 11 Cent. Rep. 806; Luders v. Hartford L. & Ann. Ins. Co. 12 Fed. Rep. 463; Kansas Protective Union v. Whitt, 36 Kan. 760; Covenant Mut. Ben. Assn. v. Hoffman, 110 Ill. 636; Suppiger v. Covenant Mut. Ben. Assn. 20 Ill. App. 506; Niblack, Mut. Ben. Societies, § 410, commenting on Newman v. Covenant Mut. Ben. Assn. 73 Iowa, 242.

There is error in the judgment appealed from. In this opinion the other Judges concurred.

Augustus S. CHASE et al., Admins., etc., of Charles Benedict, Deceased, et al.

(25 Conn. 188.)

1. A case will not be remanded for a more specific finding of facts where the facts necessary are stated in effect, and have been assumed by both parties, and the case heard on its merits without objection.
2. The superior court has jurisdiction of a suit to compel an intestate's estate, which has been saved from insolvency by the voluntary act of all the heirs of legal age, to refund the expenses incurred thereby before distribution.
3. Administrators have no power to guarantee the payment of bonds of a corporation, issued for the purpose of taking up its paper upon which decedent was liable as indorser, although such guaranty would procure an extension of time and save the estate from insolvency; hence they will incur no liability by authorizing third persons to make such guaranty on behalf of the estate.
4. Infant heirs are not liable to a contribution at law for the amount of liability voluntarily incurred by other heirs in saving the estate from insolvency.
5. Where a decedent's estate is saved from insolvency by the act of all the parties interested who were of age and legally capable of acting, in guaranteeing, to a certain extent, with the approval of the administrator, the bonds of a corporation, for which the intestate was liable as indorser, the amount which they were compelled to pay on such guaranty should be refunded to them before distribution, although objection is made by the other interested parties who were infants at the time, and although no claim against the estate was presented within the time limited therefor by law. Having voluntarily sacrificed their own private funds to save the estate, and having in fact saved it, they are equitably entitled to have the whole estate, and not merely their shares of it, bear the burden.

(October 30, 1883.)

PRESERVATION from the Superior Court for New Haven County of an action to recover from a decedent's estate the amount which plaintiffs alleged they had advanced to save the estate from insolvency. Judgment for plaintiffs advised.

The plaintiffs are the widow and two of the children of Charles Benedict, deceased. Defendants are the minor heirs of said Benedict and the administrators of his estate.

The complaint alleged that at the time of his death the decedent was liable as indorser upon a large amount of commercial paper of Mitchell, Vance & Co., which notes were then maturing and if presented and allowed against the estate would have rendered it wholly insolvent; and that, for the purpose of relieving the estate, the plaintiffs, being then all the parties interested who were of age and legally capable to act, entered into an agreement with the corporation that they would guarantee its bonds to the amount of $144,000, the proceeds of which should be used in taking up the notes, other bonds being guaranteed by other stockholders, and that the bonds were issued and guaranteed, and the notes paid with the proceeds; that the corporation failed in 1887 while a portion of the bonds guaranteed by the plaintiffs remained unpaid, and that in consequence thereof they had been compelled to pay upon them the sum of $47,000, which the administrators, upon demand made, had refused to pay; and that the estate of Benedict was being settled as a solvent estate, and that the time limited for presenting claims against it had long since expired. Judgment at law was prayed for against the administrators for the amount so paid, and for equitable relief.

The defendants demurred to the complaint on the ground that the superior court had no original jurisdiction in the matter. The demurrer was overruled and the defendants then filed a denial.

Upon the trial the following facts were found:

Charles Benedict died on the 30th of October, 1881, and the defendants A. S. Chase and Gilman C. Hill were appointed administrators of his estate. The estate was represented solvent, and the court limited six months from and after the 14th day of November in which to present claims against it.

Benedict died intestate, leaving a widow, Cornelia M. Benedict, and two daughters, Amelia C. Benedict and Charlotte B. Hill, plaintiffs in this action, and minor children of a deceased daughter, heirs-at-law to his estate.

At the time of his death he was indorser of a large amount of notes and drafts of Mitchell, Vance & Co. The total amount of his liability was $800,000. Mitchell, Vance & Co. at the decease of Benedict were supposed to be solvent, but could not meet these notes when they matured without renewals; and for the purpose of enabling the corporation to renew its paper without such indorsement and guaranty they entered into an agreement with the plaintiffs, by which the plaintiffs were to guarantee bonds to be issued by the corporation to an amount equal to one half the stock which Benedict at the time of his death owned and held in the corporation, which amount of guaranteed bonds was $144,000.

These bonds were used by Mitchell, Vance & Co. in taking up their obligations which Benedict had indorsed or guaranteed, which were paid by them upon maturity. These notes and drafts were paid by the corporation and not by the plaintiffs, nor were they in any manner assigned or conveyed to the plaintiffs, nor were they ever presented against Benedict's estate, nor any claim made upon the estate therefor. The bonds were so guaranteed by the plaintiffs on or before the 1st of December, 1881. In the summer of 1887 Mitchell, Vance & Co. failed in business, and a receiver was appointed to settle the affairs of the corporation, and on the 1st day of January, 1888, the plaintiffs were obliged to pay to the receiver the sum of $47,000, being one half the amount of the bonds so guaranteed by them still outstanding and unpaid by the corporation, the corporation also settling its debts for 80 cents on the dollar. The plaintiffs in guaranteeing the bonds supposed they were acting for the benefit of the estate, and relieving it from its liability by reason of the indorsements and guaranties of Benedict in his lifetime, so that no claim there-far would ever come against the estate, believing that Mitchell, Vance & Co. would fully pay and discharge the bonds so guaranteed by them.

The estate of Benedict is now in process of settlement in the probate court. The plaintiffs have presented their claims and made demand of the administrators for payment thereof.

Benedict at the time of his decease was the largest stockholder in the corporation of Mitchell, Vance & Co., and the plaintiffs in making the guaranty of bonds acted as they supposed for the benefit of the estate, to preserve the stock as an asset of value to the estate, as well as to relieve the estate from liability for the indorsements.

If the notes so indorsed by Benedict had matured as a claim against his estate, and been presented against it, it would have subjected the estate to a much larger liability, and rendered it insolvent if compelled to pay them. The bonds were so guaranteed with the knowledge and approval of the administrators, so far as they had any power to approve it.

Upon these facts the case was reserved for the advice of this court.

Mr. S. W. Kellogg, for plaintiffs:

The plaintiffs are entitled to judgment against the administrators. It was their duty to take the necessary steps to relieve the estate from liability.

Griswold v. Bigelow, 8 Conn. 268; Davis v. Farnsands, 45 Conn. 600.

This was money paid for their benefit as administrators, and can be recovered back.

Bailey v. Hussey, 28 Conn. 435; 2 Greenl. Ev. §§ 106, 113, 114; Keell v. Partridge, 8 T. R. 308.

If the plaintiffs are not entitled to a judgment at law against the administrators, a court of equity will grant them relief.

Wherever there is a wrong there is a remedy.

Hawley v. Botsford, 37 Conn. 80; Bacon v. Thorp, Id. 251; Davis v. Farnsands, supra; Booth v. Starr, 5 Day, 419.

Maura C. W. Gillette and G. B. Terry, for defendants:

The superior court has no original jurisdiction to grant any relief. The estate is still in process of settlement in the probate court, and all questions relating to the settlement of the estate, or to the administration account, are exclusively within the jurisdiction of that court, and can only come to the superior court by way of appeal.

Pitts v. Pitkin, 7 Conn. 818; Bailey v. Strong, 8 Conn. 278; Beach v. Norton, 9 Conn. 100.

The plaintiffs are not entitled to a judgment at law against the administrators for the money paid as they had no power to bind the estate for any such purpose.

Rhodes v. Seymour, 36 Conn. 1.

Carpenter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There are two facts essential to the plaintiffs' right to recover: (1) that Benedict's estate was in peril; (2) that it was relieved of that peril by the plaintiffs. The finding does not state either fact in so many words. Are they in effect stated? If so, we can dispose of the case; if not, we must remand the case for a more specific finding.

There are two considerations which incline us to regard the finding as sufficient: 1. The case has been heard upon its merits without objection from either party, or suggestions from the court. 2. Both parties have assumed that both facts exist, and have argued the case upon that assumption.

A careful consideration of the facts stated leads us to the conclusion, if not as a necessary inference, yet as a reasonable and proper one under the circumstances, that the estate was in peril, and that the plaintiffs at their own expense rescued it from its liability.

Benedict in his lifetime assumed a contingent liability for Mitchell, Vance & Co., a New York corporation, of which he was a stockholder, to the amount of $400,000; which liability was on his estate at the time of his decease. The corporation was unable to meet the paper indorsed by Benedict as it matured, without renewals, and no renewals could be had. That finding seems to exclude the supposition that the corporation could meet its paper, unless aided by the estate or by someone interested in it. In less than six years the corporation failed. That it was on the verge of insolvency, if not actually insolvent, is evident from the fact that it was unable to meet its maturing liabilities. Something must be done, or that paper will inevitably be presented against the estate. It necessarily follows that the estate was in imminent peril. Presentation meant payment, and payment by the estate meant insolvency.

Did the plaintiffs relieve it of its peril? In about one month after Benedict's death the plaintiffs guaranteed bonds of the corporation to the amount of $144,000. That was done, as it is found, "for the purpose of enabling the corporation to renew its paper without such indorsement and guaranty." It is also found that "the bonds were used by said Mitchell, Vance & Co. in taking up their obligations which said Benedict had indorsed or guaranteed." A portion of the bonds were outstanding when Mitchell Vance & Co. failed, and the plaintiffs were obliged to pay thereon $47,000. Had they advanced $144,000 in cash instead of guaranteeing bonds, and the money had been used to take up the indorsed paper as it matured, it would have conclusively appeared that they relieved the estate. Is the fact that they accomplished the same result by loaning their credit any less conclusive? In either case it may be said that time is of some importance; that insolvency may have overtaken the corporation after the death of Benedict; so that it is uncertain whether the plaintiffs in fact benefited the estate. The reply is that there is no presumption to that effect; on the contrary, if insolvency originated subsequently, the presumption is that the defendants by an appropriate plea would have called the attention of the court to that fact. In the absence of any claim on that subject, the court is not bound to take into consideration mere possibilities. It is possible that the property of the corporation may have been destroyed by fire with no insurance; that they met with heavy losses otherwise, and the like; but these are not subjects for conjecture, but are matters to be proved. The court is not bound to inquire whether the defendants have a defense which they have not chosen to interpose. It is proper and according to the usual course for us to take the facts as the parties present them to us; and we can safely interpret them as both parties do, more especially if they are hardly susceptible of any other rational interpretation. We conclude, therefore, that the estate was in great peril and that the plaintiffs rescued it.

The time had come when something must be done. The estate could not legally take the risk. The administrators personally might do so, but they were not bound to, and could not be expected to. Two thirds in interest of the heirs could and did lend their aid; the remaining third, being minors, did not. The plaintiffs did not act officiously or unreasonably. On the contrary, it may be characterized as good business management. The result proved that while there was a loss, yet that it was doubtless much less than the estate would have suffered had nothing been done. This is a suit to reimburse the plaintiffs from the assets of the estate. The minor heirs defend. The case is reserved for the advice of this court.

What is it that the plaintiffs ask? They do not ask, as may be supposed from the defendants' brief, that the defendants may be compelled to pay a part of the expenses of a losing venture; neither do they ask any compensation for the risk assumed. They simply ask that the fund which they have saved by a successful venture may refund to them the expense before distribution.

The first defense interposed is a demurrer, raising the claim that the superior court has no jurisdiction; that it is one of those matters within the jurisdiction of the court of probate. Without saying that the court of probate could not have passed upon this matter, we are inclined to regard it as a disputed claim against the estate, not, it is true, an ordinary claim, but still a claim on which a suit may properly be brought to the superior court, especially as it is claimed that the administrators are liable at law. Whether an estate being settled as a solvent estate is indebted or not, legally or equitably, when it is disputed, is a question for the courts. If an administrator incurs expense in the course of his duty, the question whether he is to be repaid from the estate is a question for the court of probate. If, in this case, the administrators had done what the plaintiffs did, the question whether they should be reimbursed would be a question for the court of probate. Other parties having volunteered, they bring a suit claiming that the administrators are liable at law, and if not, then in equity. The question of legal liability seems clearly to be a question for the superior court. We think that the question of liability in equity is also within the jurisdiction of that court.

The next question is, Are the administrators liable at law? They had no power to bind the estate in a matter of this kind. Any previous request, or subsequent promise, would have been of no avail. What they could not do they could not authorize others to do; and it is not claimed that they have made themselves personally liable.

There can be no remedy at law against the defendant heirs, for they were incapable of contracting, and made no contract in fact. No legal duty rested upon them, so that there is no ground on which a request can be implied. For the same reason they are not liable to a contribution at law.

Have the plaintiffs any equitable remedy? It will be noticed that the defendants' brief deals almost exclusively with a contract liability, or a personal liability on some other ground. An equitable claim upon the fund, as distinguished from a claim against the defendants personally, is hardly alluded to. We agree with them that no judgment against them in personam should be rendered, but whether the plaintiffs are not entitled to be reimbursed from the fund which they have saved is quite a different question. No case has been referred to, and we are unable to find any directly in point. A simple statement of the case shows such strong equities that authorities are hardly needed, and little else need be said by way of argument.

There are analogous cases, however, which in principle strongly support the plaintiffs' claim. When a cargo at sea is in peril a portion of it is frequently sacrificed to save the balance. In such cases the doctrine of general average compels the freight that is saved to contribute towards making good the loss. Here the whole estate was in peril. The plaintiffs voluntarily sacrificed their own private funds to save it. They in fact saved it. Why should the defendants share in the whole estate as though it had never been in peril, and compel the plaintiffs to bear the whole burden?

So also with the doctrines of apportionment and contribution. They are often applied, especially in cases of burdens upon real estate, where, ex æquo et bono, the party is entitled to relief. See Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 477, 478, 479, 482.

Few cases can be supposed in which the equities are stronger than in the present. Take another class of cases: a fund, in which several persons are interested, is attached, or involved in litigation, requiring a heavy expense to defend it, or settle its status, and the like. Usually the fund is charged with the expenses, and the balance only is distributed. These cases and others that might be mentioned are decided upon principles that are fairly applicable to the present case. We do not believe it will be unjust to apply them to this case.

Once more. Suppose these administrators, as they might, although not bound to, had risked their private fortunes in doing precisely what these plaintiffs did, and had thereby saved the estate at an expense to themselves of $50,000. Would these heirs—plaintiffs and defendants—have been heard to say: "You did it voluntarily, no law required it; therefore you must bear the loss while we will enjoy the estate?" Is it so that an administrator, who, prompted by no duty, but simply by a desire to benefit the estate, incurs an expense whereby it is in fact benefited, may not be reimbursed? The case before us can hardly be distinguished in principle from the case supposed. The administrators did not act, but with their approval the plaintiffs did, and justice requires that they should be reimbursed.

The Superior Court is advised to render judgment for the plaintiffs, to be paid from the estate.

In this opinion Lewis, Prentice and J. M. Hall, Jr., concurred; Beardsley, J., dissented.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

N. E. ALLOWAY and Wife, Appts.,

Mayor, etc., of NASHVILLE.

(.....Tenn.....)

1. The value for a reservoir site of property taken for that purpose cannot be taken as the measure of damages for the taking, but must be considered as one of the elements that make up its market value. The market value, in view of all available uses, is the measure of compensation.
2. The possibility of unskillful and improper construction of a reservoir which is not yet completed cannot be considered in estimating damages to adjacent property in proceedings by eminent domain. It must be assumed that the work will be done in a skillful and proper manner.
3. The burden of proof as to the right of a corporation to take property in the exercise of the right of eminent domain, and to show that the particular property is necessary for its corporate use, is on the corporation.
4. Concession by the owner of petitioner's right to condemn land, and limitation of the contest to the question of damages only, do not relieve the petitioner of the burden of proof, or give the land owner the right to open and close the argument.
5. Interest should be allowed on the value of property condemned for public use from the time of its appropriation.

circuit court, when verdict and judgment were rendered for $12,532. From that judgment Alloway and wife prosecuted an appeal in error to this court.

The assignment of errors presents several important and interesting questions of law and practice, which it is necessary to consider somewhat in detail in order to reach an intelligent decision of the case. It is objected, and assigned as error, that the owners of the land were not permitted to show its particular value as a reservoir site; and, again, that the trial judge, in his charge, instructed the jury that, in determining the value of the property taken, they could not single out from the elements of general value its value for one special purpose. These two objections raise the same legal question, and will for that reason be considered together.

The "just compensation" required by our Constitution (art. 1, § 21) is the fair cash value of the land taken for public use, estimated as if the owner were willing to sell, and the corporation desired to buy, that particular quantity at that place and in that form. Woodfolk v. Nashville & O. R. Co. 2 Swan, 437; East Tennessee & V. R. Co. v. Love, 3 Head, 67; Tennessee & A. R. Co. v. Adams, 3 Head, 600; Memphis v. Bolton, 9 Heisk. 509.

This value means the market value. Lewis, Em. Dom. § 478. Mississippi & R. R. Boom Co. v. Patterson, 98 U. S. 408 [35 L. ed. 208]; Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th ed. 600.

It includes every element of usefulness and advantage in the property. If it be useful for agriculture or for residence purposes; if it has adaptability for a reservoir site, or for the operation of machinery; if it contains a quarry of stone, or a mine of precious metals, if it possesses advantage of location, or availability for any useful purpose whatever,—all these belong to the owner, and are to be considered in estimating its value. It matters not that the owner uses the property for the least valuable of all the ends to which it is adapted, or that he puts it to no profitable use at all. All its capabilities are his, and must be taken into the estimate. This does not mean that all the capabilities are to be priced separately, and the aggregate put down as the true value; for they do not exist independently of each other, and cannot all be realized at the same time. Nor will it do to restrict the estimate to any one of them, because in one view that would exclude the other elements altogether, and in the other view it would tend to make the degree of benefit to the party appropriating and condemning for a particular purpose the real measure of value, which is never allowable.

The field of investigation, in the case before us, was a very broad one. The location and elevation of the property were given. Its surface, area and present use were described. The existence and character of stone within its compass, and the fact that the best of the stone was used in the construction of the walls of the reservoir, were disclosed. The City's engineer said that the hill had some value for residence purposes, but was valuable "mostly for a reservoir site," and this view was confirmed by Mr. John Overton, who said that there was only "one or two more good places for a reservoir" in reach of the City. No witness was allowed to put a price upon any single element of usefulness or advantage, but all the foregoing facts and circumstances were stated in detail by one witness and another, and from them all the witnesses gave their opinions as to the market value of the property. The questions calling for such opinions were generally in this form: "Considering the property sought to be condemned in the form it was taken, and as it was taken, and having regard to the entire property, and the uses to which it was put, and also the uses to which it was adapted, and assuming that Mr. Alloway wanted to sell, but was not obliged to sell, this piece or parcel of land, and the City wanted to buy it, but was not obliged to have it, what was the cash market value of the same in August, 1887, and what would be just compensation to Mr. Alloway, and what damages should be allowed him?" Some of the witnesses, especially those put upon the stand by the owners, answered that question as to their acquaintance with the property and its market value.

With respect to the mode of ascertaining the value of the land taken, the circuit judge instructed the jury in these words: "In estimating its value, all the capabilities of the property, and all the uses to which it may be applied, are to be considered, and not merely the condition it is in at the time, and the use to which it is then applied by the owner. It is not a question of the value of the property to the owner, nor can the value be advanced by his unwillingness to sell. On the other hand, the damages cannot be measured by the value of the property to the party condemning it, nor by its need of the particular property. The City is entitled to have the land at its fair, market, cash value, unaffected by the fact that it needs it, or desires it. If it were otherwise, the value of land would not be measured by what it is actually worth in the market, but by the extent to which it might be necessary for public use; and so, when an appropriation of land is made for a city reservoir, the question is not what the land is worth to the City for the special purpose, for that would be to measure the value by the immediate necessities of the public, rather than the actual worth of the land. In determining the market cash value, you cannot single out from the elements of general value the value for an especial purpose, but you are to consider all the constituent elements that make up the market value,—its availability, adaptability and capacity for different uses and purposes. In determining the market cash value, everything which enhances or depreciates its worth should be taken into consideration. If the existence of a rock quarry under the surface of the hill augmented or entered into the market value of the land, that fact should be considered; but the jury could make no separate allowance for the rock, for that would necessitate an inquiry into the cost of excavating and raising it. The cash market value of the land with the rock in it would be the proper consideration." To a great extent, and entirely so, so far as the cases are alike, this charge is sustained by the opinion of this court in Woodfolk v. Nashville & O. R. Co. 2 Swan, 437; and in that and all other respects it is in accord with the doctrine laid down in Lewis, Em. Dom. §§ 470, 479, 486; 8 Butherland, Dam. 441, 443, Mills, Em. Dom. 2d ed. § 146; Moulton v. Newburyport Water Co. 157 Mass. 168; Barrie v. Louisiana & S. R. Co. 38 Pa. 87, and in other cases not necessary to be cited.

Thus, as we think, every legitimate question on this branch of the case was developed, and properly submitted for the consideration of the jury. The action of the trial judge was right, both in the rejection of evidence of the amount of value for a reservoir site, and in the instruction that the jury could not single out and estimate the value for a special purpose.

We fully agree with the learned counsel of Alloway and wife, that "the particular purpose for which a piece of property is most applicable" must be considered in estimating the value of such property. That was done in this case. It was distinctly proven that "Kirkpatrick's Hill" was applicable, "mostly, for a reservoir site," and the jury was told to consider that, and every other element of value. That they did so cannot be doubted for a moment, in the light of the whole proof, and the amount of the verdict returned. Our holding is that, while adaptability for a reservoir site must be considered, the value for such a purpose exclusively cannot be shown in proof, and made the sole basis of a recovery, especially when the property possesses other capabilities, as in this case.

There is a lack of harmony in the decisions on this subject, some of them permitting the inquiry as to the value of the property for one special use, and others holding, as we do, that the market value in view of all available uses is the measure of compensation. It is not desirable to review all the cases in this opinion, but some of them will be mentioned. The latest one in the former line is that of San Diego Land & Town Co. v. Nais, decided by the Supreme Court of California in 1888, and published in 78 Cal. 63, 8 L. R. A. 82. In that case it was held, distinctly, that it was competent to prove the value of land for a reservoir site, and to make that value the measure of damages, independent of any other consideration or element of value; and that, too, when the land sought to be condemned was in fact not the real site of the reservoir, but only necessary to contain backwater from the dam below. To reach that conclusion, two former decisions by the same court, holding a contrary rule, were overruled, and other authorities cited in the opinion, were followed. In a case of the other line this language is used: "But, where a condemnation is sought for the purpose of a railroad, to single out from the elements of general value the value for the special purposes of such railroad is, in effect, to put to a jury the question, What is the land worth to the particular railroad company? rather than, What is it worth in general? The practical result would be to make the company's necessity the land owner's opportunity to get more than the real value of his land." Sisson v. Chicago, St. P. & M. R. Co. 27 Minn. 201.

The case of Mississippi & R. R. Boom Co. v. Patterson, 98 U. S. 408 [25 L. ed. 306], is cited by the California court, and is relied on as a sound authority by counsel on both sides of 8 L. R. A.

this controversy. Patterson owned one island, and parts of two others, in the Mississippi River, which the boom company condemned. The value was first appraised by commissioners, and afterwards by a jury in the circuit court of the United States. When the case reached the Supreme Court, Mr. Justice Field, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The jury found a general verdict assessing the value of the land at $9,858.88, but accompanied it with a special verdict assessing its value, aside from any consideration of its value for boom purposes, at $200, and, in view of its adaptability for those purposes, a further and additional value of $9,058.88. . . . In determining the value of land appropriated for public purposes, the same considerations are to be regarded as in a sale of property between private parties. The inquiry in such cases must be, What is the property worth in the market, viewed not merely with reference to the uses to which it is at the time applied, but with reference to the uses to which it is plainly adapted? That is to say, What is it worth from its availability for valuable uses? Property is not to be deemed worthless because the owner allows it to go to waste, or to be regarded as valueless because he is unable to put it to any use. Others may be able to use it, and make it subserve the necessities and conveniences of life. Its capability of being made thus available gives it a market value which can be readily estimated. So many and varied are the circumstances to be taken into the account in determining the value of property condemned for public purposes, that it is perhaps impossible to formulate a rule to govern its appraisal in all cases. Exceptional circumstances will modify the most carefully guarded rule, but, as a general thing, we should say that the compensation to the owner is to be estimated by reference to the uses for which the property is suitable, having regard to the existing business or wants of the community, or such as may be reasonably expected in the immediate future. The position of the three islands in the Mississippi fitting them to form, in connection with the west bank of the river, a boom of immense dimensions, capable of holding in safety over twenty millions of feet of logs, added largely to the value of the land. The boom company would greatly prefer them to more valuable agricultural lands, or to lands situated elsewhere on the river; as, by utilizing them in the manner proposed, they would save heavy expenditures of money in constructing a boom of equal capacity. Their adaptability for boom purposes was a circumstance, therefore, which the owner had a right to insist upon as an element in estimating the value of his lands." 98 U. S. 403, 407, 408 [25 L. ed. 307, 308].

This lengthy extract presents the rule for compensation, and its application to the facts of the case. Both, as we understand them, are in harmony with, and suggest, the views expressed in this opinion. There the adaptability of the islands for boom purposes was held to be an element of value to be considered by the jury, here it is decided that the adaptability of the hill for purposes of a reservoir is an element of value to be taken into the estimate. There it was treated as an element only, to be considered in connection with other elements of value, so it is here. In that case the contention of the condemning party was that the adaptability of the lands for boom purposes should not enter into the estimate at all. The court said it should, in the words quoted. No comment is made in the opinion on the fact that the jury, in a special verdict, assessed the value for boom purposes separately. That method is neither approved nor disapproved, by intimation or otherwise. The general verdict, as reduced by the owner on suggestion of the lower court, was affirmed.

A late author, speaking on this subject, says: "The market value of property includes its value for any use to which it may be put. If, by reason of its surroundings, or its natural advantages, or its artificial improvements, or its intrinsic character, it is peculiarly adapted to some particular use, all the circumstances which make up this adaptability may be shown, and the fact of such adaptation may be taken into consideration in estimating the compensation. Some of the cases held that its value for a particular use may be proved, but the proper inquiry is, What is its market value, in view of any use to which it may be applied, and of all the uses to which it is adapted? . . . The conclusion from the authorities and reason of the matter seems to be that witnesses should not be allowed to give their opinions as to the value of property for a particular purpose, but should state its market value in view of any purpose to which it is adapted. The condition of the property, and all its surroundings, may be shown and its availability for any particular use. If it has a peculiar adaptation for certain uses, this may be shown, and if such peculiar adaptation adds to its value the owner is entitled to the benefit of it. But, when all the facts and circumstances have been shown, the question at last is, What is it worth in the market?" Lewis, Em. Dom. § 479.

By statute the owner is entitled to compensation for land actually appropriated, and, in addition, to incidental damages for injury, if any, to the residue of the tract. Mill. & V. Code, § 1862.

Both were claimed in this case, but only the former was allowed by the jury. As ground for incidental damages, the use, amount and relative position of the residue, and the capacity (50,000,000 of gallons) and dimensions of the reservoir, were shown. It was also proven that the walls of the reservoir were made of stone taken from the hill; that some of the stone was good for such purpose, and some of it was not, the yield, altogether, being largely more than was used in the wall. Upon these and some other circumstances the witnesses express various opinions on the question of depreciation or no depreciation in the market value of the residue.

The general charge with respect to incidental damages is not assailed, but error is assigned upon this paragraph: "Damages are to be assessed on the basis that the work will be constructed and operated in a skillful and proper manner. All damages resulting from the neglect in these respects, or from negligence in the use of the reservoir, may be recovered, by appropriate suits, when such damages occur." The objection to this is "because a reasonable apprehension of danger would impair the whole of the property in the vicinity, and, when it had been shown that the walls were built from the stone taken from the site, and that most of the stone in the hill was of bad quality, this was ground to apprehend danger. And, besides, the present owner is entitled to the incidental damages." It seems to be well settled that damages to the residue are to be estimated on the assumption that the part actually appropriated will be used in a skillful and proper manner. Mills, Em. Dom. § 220. Lewis, Em. Dom. § 482.

Clearly, this must be so when the damages are assessed before the construction and operation are commenced. If it were otherwise, no appraisal could be made until after the work is completed, because it could not sooner be known how defective the work will be, nor the amount of depreciation caused thereby. The rule should be the same when the construction is in progress, and not completed. When the trial below occurred, the work on the reservoir had been going on a long while, and was approaching completion, but it could not be finished for several months to come. The City was under legal obligation to so construct its improvement as to do the least injury to the residue of the land; and the presumption that it would perform that duty faithfully should be indulged until the work was finished, and the presumption rebutted. Even though some defects should, through negligence, occur in the construction, it is fair to assume that it will be detected and cured before putting the reservoir to its ultimate use. In like manner, the law devolves upon the City the duty of operating the reservoir carefully and skillfully; and it would be unjust to assume in advance that it will not do so. A different rule would be impracticable, as well as unjust; for no one could tell the amount to be allowed for improper operation until the fact itself should be ascertained, and the consequences seen and weighed.

The owner is entitled to all his damages, those for the land taken, and those to the residue, so soon as the condemnation is made. Neither he nor the condemning party can await future developments to enhance or diminish the amount of damages. These must be estimated on the assumption that the land appropriated will be properly and in a reasonable time put to the use for which it is condemned. We by no means intend to decide that incidental damages must be estimated upon the assumption that the construction and operation of the improvement will be absolutely safe, and that apprehension of danger therefrom may not be considered by the jury. Our meaning is that such damages cannot be enhanced by the suggestion that the corporation appropriating the land will act negligently. The presumption is that it will act carefully. If it act otherwise, and injury result from its negligence, that affords an independent cause of action; and the liability so incurred forms no part of the incidental damages. There may be reasonable apprehensions of danger from inherent defects and unavoidable accidents, notwithstanding skillful construction and careful operation of the improvement. If so, such apprehension, so far as it depreciates the present market value of the land not taken, is an element of incidental damages, and should be considered by the jury in making up their verdict. Such apprehension was not excluded from the consideration of the jury in this case. Only that resulting from the neglect or negligence of the city was so excluded. At this point, it is well to note the fact that there was no proof that any of the inferior stone had been placed in the wall, or that any of the work had been unskillfully done.

Each side claimed the right to open and close the argument before the jury. The trial judge decided in favor of the City, and that action is assigned as error. This question has been decided in several of the States, some of them holding one way, and some the other. The majority of the cases seem to give the opening and conclusion to the land owner. Lewis, Em. Dom. § 426.

The conflict in the decisions is largely due, no doubt, to difference in local practice, or statutory provisions. In this State the proceeding is inaugurated by the party seeking to appropriate the land. It is done by a petition setting forth the land wanted, the object for which it is to be condemned, the name of the owner, and concluding with appropriate prayers. Notice is to be given the owner, after which a jury, to inquire and assess the damages, is summoned and sworn. Either party may appeal from the finding of this jury, and have a trial anew before a jury in the circuit court. Mill. & V. Code, §§ 1549-1556, inclusive.

Not only is the corporation seeking the condemnation required to take the first steps, and bring the land owner before the court, in the prescribed order, but it must, of necessity, show that it is entitled to exercise the right of eminent domain, and that the particular land is necessary for its corporate use. In all this the petitioner is plaintiff, with the affirmative of its claim, and the burden of proof upon it. The question of the amount of damages is then considered, and generally one side seeks to make it as small, and the other as large, as possible. Starting out as plaintiff, with the onus upon it, the petitioner should be allowed to open and close the case, even though the burden of proof may be shifted to the other party on some question arising in the progress of the trial. Concession by the owner of petitioner's right to condemn, and to take the particular land, and contesting the question of damages only, cannot change the rule; nor can the fact that the owner alone appealed from the appraisal by the jury of inquest, for on that appeal the trial is de novo, and the attitude of the parties is the same as before.

The jury allowed no interest. No instructions on that subject were given or requested, but after the verdict was returned, and before judgment was entered, Alloway and wife moved the court to add interest. This the court refused to do; and his action in that regard is now assigned as error. The Statute authorizing the condemnation of private property for public use, and prescribing the mode of proceeding, is silent on this subject; and the General Statutes (Id. § 2702) which enumerates instruments that bear interest as a matter of law, does not embrace a case like that before us. Nevertheless, we have no hesitation in holding, upon general principles, that interest should have been allowed from the time of the appropriation of the property. From that time the original owner was deprived of the use and possession of the land taken. The liability of the City accrued at that date, though the amount thereof is not determined finally until long thereafter. Damages are properly assessed with reference to the value of the land taken, and the depreciation of the residue at the time of condemnation. The legal rights of both parties, so far as the damages are concerned, are fixed at that time. Subsequent enhancement or diminution of the value, though ever so great, cannot be considered by the jury in estimating damages. Witnesses are examined as to the amount of damages at the time of appropriation, and not at the time of the trial. That method was properly adopted in this case. The City, especially, asked her witnesses the value of the property "in August, 1887."

In the case of East Tennessee V. & G. R. Co. v. Burnett, 11 Lea, 526, the jury of inquest, though reporting several years after the land was appropriated, failed to allow interest. The petitioner did not appeal, and have a trial de novo, but excepted to the report because it did not include interest. The exception was overruled, and the petitioner prosecuted a writ of error. This court allowed the interest. Id. 537.

A discussion of the subject is found in § 420, Lewis, Em. Dom. Refusal to allow interest was error. In the language of one of the counsel for appellants: "If the party in whose favor there is verdict is, as a matter of law, entitled to something additional, the court may allow it." Inasmuch as the error can be readily corrected here, that will be done, instead of reversing and remanding. This court will render the judgment that should have been rendered below. The land was taken about the 10th of August, 1887; hence judgment will be entered for the amount of the verdict, with interest from that date.

On September 23, 1888, the City paid into court, subject to the order of Alloway and wife, the sum of $10,673.51, that being the amount of damages returned by the jury of view, with interest and costs added. Because of this tender, the City now insists that it can in no event be liable for interest on a larger sum than the difference between the verdict and the amount so paid into court. This contention, though plausible at first view, is not sustained by sound reason. A tender of part of a debt, in satisfaction of the whole of it, is no tender at all in law. The sum paid into court in this case was more than $3 000 less than the amount due Alloway and wife, as has since been demonstrated by the verdict of the jury, hence they were under no obligation to receive it, and cannot have their claim for interest abated on account of their refusal to do so.

The other grounds of error assigned, so far as material, fall within principles already announced, and for that reason they will not be further mentioned.

Let the judgment be modified by adding interest, and affirmed, with costs.

Corporations organized under section 3680 of the Revised Statutes, which do not comply with the laws regulating regular mutual life insurance companies, have no power to issue policies guaranteeing any fixed amount to be paid at the death of the member, "except such fixed amount shall be conditioned upon the same being realized from the assessments made on members to meet it;" and those corporations so organized, which do comply with such laws, are authorized to issue endowment policies "promising to pay to members during life any sum of money or thing of value." March 4, 1903

PETITION for a writ of quo warranto to oust defendant from exercising the franchise of transacting the business of a life insurance company within the State. Judgment of ouster.

Statement by Williams, J.:

The petition states that the defendant is a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Michigan for the purpose of carrying on, upon the assessment or co-operative plan, the business of insuring the lives of its members, and of providing to its members indemnity for disability by accident, that since the 1st day of April, 1899, the defendant has exercised and claims the right to exercise, in this State, the privilege and franchise of transacting the business of insuring lives upon the assessment plan, which it is not entitled to do, because neither it nor any of its agents obtained from the superintendent of insurance of this State the necessary certificate of authority or license to do business in this State, and also because, by the statutes of Michigan, corporations organized under the laws of Ohio, for the purpose of insuring the lives of members upon the assessment plan, are not permitted to do business in the State of Michigan upon the same basis and limitations as they are in this State; and, the commissioner of insurance of the State of Michigan has refused, and still refuses, to issue to such Ohio corporations his certificate of authority to transact business in that State. The provisions of the Michigan statutes upon the subject are set out in the petition. Such of them as are deemed material to the decision of the case will be noticed in the opinion.

The petition prays for a judgment of ouster against the defendant.

The answer admits that the defendant was incorporated under the Michigan statute set forth in the petition; that it has exercised, and claims the right to exercise, in this State, the privilege and franchise referred to in the petition, and alleges that it is entitled to do so, because, it avers that on the 9th day of June, 1896, it made application to the superintendent of insurance of this State for permission to carry on in the State of Ohio the business of life insurance, as contemplated in section 3690a of the Revised Statutes of Ohio; and that on the 18th day of September, 1896, the superintendent of insurance duly authorized the defendant to transact business in this State; since which time the defendant has continuously prosecuted its business in this State as contemplated in section 3690 of the Revised Statutes. The answer further alleges that Ohio corporations organized for the purpose of insuring their members upon the assessment plan are not debarred by the laws of Michigan from transacting business in that State, and that the insurance commissioner of that State has not refused to issue certificates of authority to transact business in that State, to such Ohio corporations as can and will comply with the laws of the State of Michigan. It is also alleged in the answer that the petition was filed at the instigation of "The People's Mutual Benefit Association of Westerville, Ohio," which corporation, on or about the 24th of October, 1898, made application to the insurance commissioner of Michigan for authority to do business in that State, but was refused such authority, because, upon examination, it was ascertained its business, in part, was that of endowment insurance, which the laws of Michigan did not permit corporations organized on the assessment plan to do.

United States Mut. Accident Assn.*, 60 Wis. 76.

The Statute of Wisconsin which enacts that a corporation organized in another State shall not transact business within its limits unless it agrees in advance that it will not remove into the federal courts any suit that may be commenced against it by a citizen of Wisconsin, is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, and void; and the

The defendant also filed a supplemental answer (so called), which charges that the superintendent of insurance has embodied in the annual report which he is required to make to the General Assembly, relating to the conduct and condition of all insurance companies doing business in this State, a statement to the effect that he has lawfully revoked the authority of the defendant to do business in Ohio after April 1, 1889, since which time it has been doing business in this State without authority of law; and that he has omitted to make any statement in his report showing the condition of the defendant Company.

By this pleading, it is sought to make the superintendent of insurance a party to the action, and enjoin him from making such report.

The case is submitted upon demurrers to the answer, and the supplemental answer.

Under Iowa Code, § 1164, providing that, where another State imposes prohibitions upon Iowa insurance companies doing business therein, the law of such State shall be the law of Iowa, as against insurance companies from such State doing business in Iowa, there need not be any enforcement in such other State of the prohibition imposed on Iowa insurance companies. The Illinois statutory provision that, whenever any other State shall require Illinois insurance companies doing business therein to deposit and pay a greater amount than the Illinois laws require of such companies, then companies of such State doing business in Illinois shall be required to pay or deposit the same amount of tax or license fee, becomes operative upon the passage of a law laying an additional burden upon Illinois companies, whether any such companies are doing business within the State passing the law or not. Germania Ins. Co. v. Swigart, 126 Ill. 287.

the defendant is not entitled to carry on its business of insurance in this State, and that it is therefore exercising its franchises here in contravention of law, because: (1) Ohio corporations organized under section 8380 of the Revised Statutes are not permitted to do business in the State of Michigan on substantially the same basis and limitations as they are in Ohio; (2) the law under which the defendant is organized authorizes it to engage in the business of insuring lives on the plan of assessments upon surviving members, without other restriction than that policy holders shall have an insurable interest in the lives of the members, which companies organized for the mutual protection of its members within this State are not permitted to do; and (3) the defendant has failed to comply with the laws of this State, which require that such corporations shall obtain annually, from the superintendent of insurance, a certificate of authority, and licenses to their agents, to do business in this State.

1. The business of life insurance, and the terms and conditions upon which foreign companies may be admitted to carry on that business, are regulated in this State by statute; and the right of the defendant to transact its business of insurance within the State, if possessed by it, must be derived, it is conceded, from § 8630e, Rev. Stat., which is as follows: "Any corporation, company or association organized under the law of any other State to insure lives of members on the assessment plan, and authorized to transact the business contemplated in section 8630, shall be permitted to do such business, to wit: the business contemplated in section 8630, in this State, by first complying with the laws of the State of Ohio, regulating corporations, companies or associations organized for the mutual protection of their members

A statute of New York providing that if any State shall require a greater deposit of securities or payment of any kind from a corporation of New York, than from foreign corporations of other States, a corporation of such State in New York shall be required to make the same deposit or payment, does not "deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." Philadelphia Fire Assn. v. New York, 119 U. S. 119 (40 L. ed. 343).

In accordance with the policy of Minnesota and of the Interstate Law of Comity, foreign insurance corporations are allowed to carry on business in that State. A foreign corporation which has complied with Minnesota laws should not, as measure of retaliation, by force of the retaliatory Statute (Minn. Gen. Stat. chap. 34, § 229), be excluded from doing business in Minnesota, upon the ground that the laws of the State where such foreign corporation was created would exclude corporations of Minnesota from doing business there, unless it is clearly apparent that such is the effect of the foreign law. The proper effect of the statutes of New York in this particular being considered doubtful, and the manner of their practical administration being undisclosed, a judgment of ouster against the New York corporation was refused. State v. Fidelity & C. Ins. Co. 30 Minn. 233.

within this State, upon obtaining from the superintendent of insurance of this State a certificate of such compliance, which certificate shall not be granted until such foreign corporation, company or association shall have appointed an agent or attorney within this State upon whom service of process may be had. Provided, that the superintendent of insurance shall not be required to issue certificates to do business in Ohio to an agent of any such corporation, company or association organized in any State in which such Ohio corporations, companies or associations are not permitted to do business on substantially the same basis and limitations as they are in Ohio."

In view of the proviso contained in this section, it becomes important to determine upon what basis and limitations Ohio corporations are permitted to do business in Ohio. These are ascertained by reference to section 8030 and 8030c of the Revised Statutes. The former section is as follows:

"Sec. 3030. A company or association may be organized to transact the business of life or accident insurance on the assessment plan, for the purpose of mutual protection and relief of its members, and for the payment of stipulated sums of money to the families or heirs of the deceased members of such company or association, and may receive money either by voluntary donation or contribution, or collect the same by assessment on its members, and may accumulate, invest, distribute and appropriate the same in such manner as it may deem proper; that all accumulations and accretions thereon shall be held and used as the property of the members and in the interest of the members, and shall not be loaned to, used, appropriated or invested for the benefit of any officer or manager of such company or association, and, provided, that no company or association shall issue a certificate for a greater amount than such company or association shall be able to pay from the proceeds of one assessment; and such company or association shall not be subject to the preceding sections of this chapter."

It is provided in section 8030c that, "no such corporation, company or association issuing endowments, certificates or policies, or undertaking, or promising to pay to members during life any sum of money, or thing of value, or certificate, or policy guaranteeing any fixed amount to be paid at death, except such fixed amount or endowments shall be conditional upon the same being realized from the assessments made on members to meet them, shall be permitted to do business in this State, until they shall comply with the laws regulating regular mutual life insurance companies."

Whatever powers such companies possess are derived exclusively from the laws of this State, and the limitations and restrictions imposed upon them by those laws, both with respect to the classes of business they may transact, and the mode of doing it, operate upon them as well when doing business outside of the State as within it. Their corporate capacity, in these respects, cannot be enlarged by the laws of any other State in which they may be permitted to do business. By the plain provisions of these Statutes, no company organized under section 8030, unless it compiles with the laws regulating regular mutual life insurance companies, can issue any policy guaranteeing any fixed amount to be paid at death, "except such amount shall be conditional upon the same being realized from the assessments made on members to meet them." In other words, the obligation of the policy, and the only one the company can thus contract, is to pay, upon the death of the member, such sum, and only such, as may be realized from the assessments made on members to meet it. The policy does not create an unconditional obligation to pay the amount specified in it, nor has the company corporate power to issue such policy, or contract such obligation, in this State or elsewhere. Then those companies, so organized, which do comply with the laws regulating mutual life insurance companies, are authorized to issue endowment policies, undertaking to pay members "during life, any sum of money or thing of value," and policies guaranteeing a fixed amount to be paid at death. These are the basis and limitations upon which such companies are authorized to do business in Ohio, and the question to be determined here is whether they are permitted by the laws of Michigan to do business there upon substantially the same basis and limitations. It is not enough that they be permitted, there, to exercise some of their franchises, or transact a part only of the business they are authorized to do in Ohio, but they must there be permitted to do substantially the same business upon substantially the same terms and conditions as they are in Ohio. If by the laws of Michigan any substantial limitation or restriction is placed upon such Ohio companies in regard to the character or extent of the business they may transact there, to which they are not subject in Ohio, it cannot be said that they are permitted to do business there upon substantially the same basis and limitations as they are in Ohio.

By section 15 of the Michigan Statute, under which it is admitted by the answer the defendant was reorganized, it is provided that "every policy or certificate issued by any corporation in that State and doing business under that Act, and promising a payment to be made upon a contingency of death, or of disability by accident, shall specify the sum of money it promises to pay upon such contingency insured against, and the number of days after satisfactory proof of the happening of such contingency at which such payment should be made; and that upon the occurrence of such contingency, unless the contract shall have been voided by fraud or by breach of its condition, the corporation shall be obligated to the beneficiaries of such payment, at the time and to the amount specified in the policy or certificate; and that this indebtedness shall have priority over all indebtedness thereafter incurred, except as provided in case of the distribution of assets of an insolvent corporation."

And section 17 of the same Act provides that no corporation or association organized under the laws of any other State for the purpose of insuring lives or furnishing accident indemnity upon the co-operative assessment plan shall be authorized to do business in Michigan until it shall have obtained a certificate of authority from the commissioner of insurance of that State; and that no such certificate of authority shall be issued unless the corporation or association applying therefor "has in force policies of insurance upon which the proceeds of one assessment will pay the highest amount insured upon each of the lives of the members for which the assessment is levied, the full amount agreed to be paid upon the death of any one member, and that it is paying, and for twelve months next preceding has paid, the highest amount named in its policies or certificates in full."

Thus it appears that by the laws of Michigan every policy issued by a corporation in that State "promising a payment to be made upon a contingency of death, . . . shall specify the sum of money it promises to pay, . . . and, upon the occurrence of such contingency, . . . the corporation shall be obligated to the beneficiaries of such payment, . . . to the amount specified in the policy," and no certificate of authority to do business in Michigan shall be issued to any corporation or association organized under the laws of any other State unless for the twelve months next preceding it has paid, and is paying, the full amount named in its policies, nor unless it has in force policies upon which the proceeds of one assessment will pay the highest amount insured upon the lives of the members for which the assessment is levied, the full amount agreed to be paid upon the death of any one member. While, as we have already seen, corporations organized under the Ohio Statute are not obligated to pay the full amount specified in the policy, but only such sum as may be realized from assessments made on its members; and their policies must so provide. They are incapable of making any other contract, or issuing any policy of insurance not so conditioned, unless they comply with the laws regulating mutual life insurance companies; in which event they are permitted in Ohio to issue endowment policies.

It is admitted by the answer that the laws of the State of Michigan do not permit endowment policies to be issued or contracts of that kind to be made by corporations organized to do business on the assessment plan, and for that reason the commissioner of insurance of that State refused to issue his certificate of authority to an Ohio company, organized under section 8630, to do business in that State.

Whether, therefore, the Ohio corporation does or does not comply with the laws regulating regular mutual life insurance companies, it is not, in either event, permitted to do business in the State of Michigan upon substantially the same basis and limitations as it is in Ohio.

2. Does the defendant come within the class of companies which, under the provisions of section 8630, may be admitted to do business in this State? It will be observed that only companies organized under the laws of any other State to insure the lives of members on the assessment plan, and authorized to transact the business contemplated in section 8630, are entitled to do business in this State; and furthermore, that it is only the business contemplated in section 8630 that such companies shall be permitted to transact. The language of the Statute is: "Any corporation, company or association, organized under the laws of any other State to insure lives of members on the assessment plan, and authorized to transact the business contemplated in section 8630, shall be permitted to do such business, to wit: the business contemplated in section 8630, in this State," upon the conditions therein specified. As often as the question has been presented, it has been held by this court that section 8630 does not contemplate or permit the business of insuring the lives of members otherwise than for the benefit of their families and heirs.

In State v. Moore, 38 Ohio St. 7, it is decided that "a company of another State organized for insuring lives upon the plan of assessment upon surviving members, without limitation, does not come under the class of companies provided for in section 8630. That section does not embrace companies insuring the lives of members for the benefit of others than their families and heirs."

And in State v. Moore, 30 Ohio St. 486, the relator, a New York corporation, organized on the assessment plan and authorized by the law governing it to issue policies payable to the legal representatives of the member, or to any beneficiary designated by such member, sought to compel, by mandamus, the insurance commissioner of this State to issue to it the necessary certificate entitling it to do business in this State. But the writ was refused. Doyle, J., in the opinion, after quoting the above paragraph of the syllabus in State v. Moore, 38 Ohio St. 7, says: "The principle thus announced must exclude the relator unless the law has been changed by subsequent legislation."

The legislation has not in this respect been changed. It is admitted by the pleadings that the defendant is authorized by the law of its reorganization to issue policies on the lives of its members for the benefit of any person who has an insurable interest in such life.

By section 15 of the Michigan Statute set out in the petition, it is provided that corporations doing business under the Act shall not issue any policy "upon a life in which the beneficiary has not an insurable interest," and it is further provided by the same section that any member "shall have the right at any time, with the consent of such corporation or association, and with the consent of the beneficiary, if he be a creditor, to make a change in his beneficiary," within certain specified limits; and further, that "such corporation shall not issue policies or certificates to beneficiaries as a creditor or creditors that do not state that they are for collateral security payable as the interest of such beneficiaries may appear; and in every such case said creditor or creditors shall only be entitled to such portion of the amount insured (not exceeding the face of the policy) as shall cover the indebtedness of the member to said creditor at the date of his death. And section 17 of the same Statute provides that "no corporation or association organized or doing business under or by virtue of the laws of any State or Territory of the United States, or District of Columbia, or foreign country, for the purpose of insuring lives, or furnishing accident indemnity upon the co-operative assessment plan, shall be authorized to do business in the State, until it shall have obtained a certificate of authority from the commissioner of insurance of this State, as hereafter provided, nor unless the State, or Territory of the United States, or District of Columbia, or foreign country under whose laws such corporation or association is organized, shall extend the right to such corporations of this State to do business in such State, Territory of the United States, District of Columbia or foreign country, upon similar conditions to those in this Act prescribed." The defendant is therefore not entitled to carry on its business in this State, and the superintendent of insurance may rightfully withhold from it license and authority to do so.

3. It is alleged in the answer that the superintendent of insurance, on the 18th day of September, 1896, authorized the defendant to transact business in this State, but it is admitted that neither the defendant, nor any agent of the defendant, has received any certificate or license from him since that date, and that it has continued to carry on its business in Ohio without other license or authority than that first granted it.

The claim of the defendant is that, when it obtained from the superintendent of insurance the certificate provided for in section 8630, it was placed in all respects upon the same footing as companies organized under section 8630, and is therefore entitled to the benefit of the last clause of that section, which provides that "such company or association shall not be subject to the preceding sections of this chapter."

We regard the case of State v. Moore, 28 Ohio St. 7, decisive of this claim, adverse to the defendant. The relator in that case claimed that, by reason of the clause referred to in section 8630, and the provisions of the Supplementary Act of April 12, 1880, which enacted section 8630 substantially as it is now, so far as it affects this question, it was exempt from the operation of section 8604, which was then, and is now, in the same chapter with section 8630. The Statute under which the relator in that case was organized, authorized it to engage in the business of insuring lives on the plan of assessments upon its surviving members, without other restrictions than that the policy holders should have an interest in the lives of members; and it was held, as before noticed, that such companies did not come within the provisions of section 8630, and that the relator was subject to the preceding sections of the chapter. In the opinion of the court, White, J., says:

"The character of the company or association authorized to do business under section 8630 is thus described in the section: 'A company or association may be organized for the purpose of mutual protection and relief of its members, and for the payment of stipulated sums of money to the families or heirs of the deceased members of such company or association, and may receive money, either by voluntary donation or contribution, or collect the same by assessment on its members . . . and such association shall not be subject to the preceding sections of this chapter. It is companies and associations of this character alone that are exempt from the operation of the preceding sections of the Act; and this exemption is allowed on account of the limited nature of the life insurance they are authorized to assume, being confined to insurance for the benefit of the families and heirs of members.'"

We have already seen that the defendant is engaged in the business of insuring lives upon the plan of assessments upon surviving members without other restriction than that policy holders shall have an insurable interest in the lives of the members, and is not within the class of companies provided for in section 8630, and therefore not exempt from the operation of the preceding sections of that chapter.

One of these sections, 8604, provides that "no company organized by Act of Congress, or under the laws of any other State of the United States, shall transact any business of insurance in this State until it procures from the superintendent of insurance a certificate of authority so to do;" and it further provides that no "person or corporation shall act as agent for any such company in procuring applications for insurance, taking risks, or in any manner transacting the business of insurance, until such person or corporation procures from the superintendent of insurance a license so to do." And by the provisions of section 8616, all licenses so granted "shall continue in force, unless suspended or revoked, until the first day of April of the year next after the date of their issue." We are of the opinion that the license granted to the defendant and its agents on the 18th day of September, 1896, expired on the first day of April ensuing, and that since that time the defendant has been doing business in this State without authority of law.

4. The defendant, availing itself of the rule that the demurrer searches the record and reaches the first defective pleading, contends that the facts averred in the petition do not entitle the plaintiff to the relief demanded. It appears from the petition that the defendant is a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Michigan, and the contention of the defendant is that quo warranto cannot be maintained against it in this State, because it can be ousted of its franchises only by the sovereignty which bestowed them. Undoubtedly, the franchises which a State has conferred upon a corporation cannot be taken from it by the act of another State, or by the judgment of its courts. Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 559.

The purpose of this action, however, is not to deprive the defendant of the franchises with which it has been invested by the laws of the State creating it, but to inquire into its authority to carry on its business in this State, and, if found to be exercising its franchises in this State in contravention of the laws thereof, to oust it therefrom. It is provided by section 8701 of the Revised Statutes that the civil action of quo warranto may be brought in the name of the State against a corporation when it claims or has exercised "a franchise, privilege or right in contravention of law."

There can be no doubt of the power of the Legislature to prescribe the terms and conditions upon which foreign corporations may be admitted to do business in this State.

It was held in W. U. Tel. Co. v. Meyer, 28 Ohio St. 521, that "foreign corporations can exercise none of their franchises or powers within this State, except by comity or legislative consent. That consent may be upon such terms and conditions as the General Assembly under its legislative power may impose." It was said by Johnson, J., in the opinion in that case, that foreign corporations "may be excluded from the State altogether, or admitted on such terms as the State may prescribe." Before exercising their franchises in this State, such corporations must, of course, comply with the conditions so imposed. Without such compliance, the exercise of their franchises in the State would be in contravention of the laws of the State, and, as just noticed, § 6761, Rev. Stat., expressly authorizes the action of quo warranto to be brought by the State against a corporation which claims or has exercised a franchise or privilege in contravention of law. This Statute is not limited to corporations organized under the laws of Ohio, but applies to corporations generally. If it had been intended to confine the application of the Statute to domestic corporations, apt language for that purpose would doubtless have been employed. We hold that a foreign corporation which is carrying on its business, and making contracts in that behalf, in this State, is exercising therein its corporate franchises, from which, when exercised in contravention of the laws of the State, it may be ousted by proceedings in quo warranto.

The proper judgment in such case is not to oust the corporation from the franchise of being a corporation, or from any of the franchises conferred on it by the law of its creation, but from the exercise of its franchises in this State.

Demurrers sustained, and judgment of ouster.

SOUTHERN PACIFIC R. CO., Appt.

(....Or.....)

*1. The provisions of our Statute (§ 4044, 4045) providing that, if a railroad fails to fence its road against live stock, it shall be liable for the injuries resulting from such failure,

*Head notes by LORD, J.

Note.—Liability of railroad company for death or injury to cattle by failure to fence; rules in various States.

Connecticut.

The duty of a railroad company, under Conn. Gen. Stat., § 3505, to fence the sides of its road "except at such place or places as the railroad commissioners shall adjudge them unnecessary," does not require a company to build a fence between its track and that of another company running nearly parallel therewith, although the latter company fails to build a fence on either side of its track. See note to Gallagher v. New York & N. E. R. Co. (Conn.) 5 L. R. A. 782.

Illinois.

The Illinois statute makes it the duty of railroad companies "to erect and maintain fences suitable and sufficient to prevent cattle, horses, sheep and hogs from getting upon their road." Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Umphenour, 69 Ill. 198.

Indiana.

A railroad company is liable for the value of cattle killed by reason of its failure to maintain a fence by keeping gate fastenings secure, which it was bound by contract to do. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Barnes, 116 Ind. 128.

Where the right of way was conveyed in consideration of a covenant to fence, the company is liable for the value of animals killed through its failure to fence, and for pasturage injured by trespassing animals, and for the loss of the increased value of property which would have resulted if the covenant had been complied with. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Sumner, 2 West. Rep. 653, 106 Ind. 56; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Moore, 2 West. Rep. 686, 106 Ind. 600; Logansport, C. & S. W. R. Co. v. Wray, 52 Ind. 578.

etc., do not extend or apply to depot grounds and in the absence of negligence, the company is not liable for stock killed thereon.

2. In this State, the common-law rule requiring every man to keep his stock within his inclosure is not in force, and from its early settlement all kinds of stock have been allowed to run at large upon unfenced lands.

3. In those jurisdictions in which the common-law rule prevails that the owner of cattle is bound to keep them in his own in-

Where the railroad company might have fenced its right of way at the place where the animal went upon the track and was killed, the company was held liable, although negligence was not charged. Pennsylvania Co. v. Dunlap, 11 West. Rep. 87, 113 Ind. 93.

One in possession of sheep, accountable for their return or for any injury to them, with the right to half their increase, is the owner within the intent of the Statute, giving a right of recovery against a railroad for animals killed where the road is not securely fenced. New York, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Auer, 8 West. Rep. 559, 106 Ind. 219.

So the borrower or tenant of an animal stands in the relation of an owner to the company on whose right of way an injury occurs. Ibid.

Where a railroad company maintains a bridge in such condition that animals may enter upon it from a public highway, the railroad is not securely fenced. Cincinnati, H. & L. R. Co. v. Jones, 9 West. Rep. 605, 111 Ind. 258.

Contributory negligence is not a defense to an action based upon a statute imposing the duty on railroad companies to fence their right of way. The disregard of this duty is not simply negligence but a tort. Jeffersonville, M. & L. R. Co. v. Ross, 87 Ind. 545; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Cahill, 68 Ind. 840; *Louisville, N. A. & C. Iowa.

A railroad company cannot claim exemption for any time, after it begins the movement of trains, on the ground that it should have a reasonable time after the construction of the road within which to build its fences. Glendon v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 58 Iowa, 457.

closure,—it is generally held, though with some exceptions, that if he suffers them to go at large, and the cattle stray upon the railroad track, and are injured or killed, the company is not liable, unless the conduct of its agents in the management of the train was wanton or wilful.

4. On the other hand, in those jurisdictions in which the common-law rule as to the duty of the owner of cattle to keep them within his own inclosure is not in force,—it is held, that a plaintiff, in allowing his stock to run at large, commits no unlawful act, nor is guilty of an omission of ordinary care; and if such stock stray upon an unenclosed railroad track, and are injured or killed, whether they are rightfully there or not, he is not guilty of contributory negligence, but the company is liable, unless it or its agents exercised ordinary care or skill, in the management of its train, to prevent their injury or destruction.

5. The principle is that a railway company is liable in damages for injuries to stock through its negligence, where the plaintiff contributed to the injury no further than permitting his stock to run at large. Such negligence, if it may be called negligence, is not the proximate cause of the injury, and, in the sense of the law, does not constitute contributory negligence.

(Thayer, Ch. J., dissent.)

(February 11, 1893.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Linn County in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's horse, which was alleged to have resulted from the negligence of defendant's servants. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Where defendant could be charged with a knowledge of a gap in the fence, the jury might find that the mules got through the gap and were killed by reason of the want of a fence. Accola v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 70 Iowa, 185.

But an instruction that where cattle get on a railroad on account of the want of fences, where the right to a fence exists, and are killed by the cars, the company is liable whether the cattle are running at large or not, is erroneous. Brentner v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 63 Iowa, 500.

Although a horse may be "crazy," if he gets upon the track of a railroad through the want of a fence, where the right to fence exists, and for want of intelligence runs ahead of the engine on the track, when he might escape on either side, and so runs into a bridge and is killed, without being struck by the engine, the company is liable, notwithstanding the horse's want of intelligence and the manner of his death. Linton v. Central Iowa R. Co. 70 Iowa, 714.

Railroad companies need not, under the Iowa Act, build fences so high that they will never be covered with snow; nor need they remove the snow and drifts from the fences, but only sufficient to keep stock off from the track. Patten v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 75 Iowa, 489.

In an action for the value of stock killed on a railroad track by reason of the want of a fence, plaintiff is not entitled to interest on his damages prior to the finding of the verdict. Brentner v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 63 Iowa, 500.

Under Comp. Laws, § 1887, the neglect to erect or maintain fences along the line of the road will render the corporation owning the road liable for the consequent damages. Under Laws 1887, p. 221, § 1. R. A.

Mr. E. C. Bronough for appellant.

Mr. J. K. Weatherford for respondent.

Lord, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover damages for negligence in the management of the defendant's railroad, whereby a horse owned by the plaintiff was killed. The answer, after making the usual denials, sets up separately, as a defense, that the injury and damages were caused by the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, all of which he denied in his reply. There was a trial had, resulting in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, from which this appeal is taken.

By his brief, the counsel for the defendant, who is the appellant, says that the appeal involves but one question: "What is the liability of a railroad company for an injury done by a moving train to a horse running at large, and seeking pasturage upon the depot grounds of the company, with the knowledge and permission of the owner?" This question arises out of an exception to a modification of an instruction asked, and is as follows: "If the jury believes from the evidence that the plaintiff voluntarily permitted his horse to run at large, and the horse was accustomed to pasture on the depot grounds of the defendant, and wandered on the railroad track, and was killed, such conduct by the plaintiff would not preclude a recovery in this case by the plaintiff, unless the defendant's servants exercised the ordinary care of prudent men in running the train at the time of the accident. In this case, if you believe from the evidence that the the injured party has the right to elect against which corporation he will proceed. Hay City & R. R. Co. v. Austin, 21 Mich. 280.

A railway company is liable for the damages resulting from the insufficiency or want of repair of its fences, in the absence of any proof showing an extraordinary cause for such condition. Ibid.

Where a railroad track crosses a highway diagonally, and the company, in fencing its right of way, leaves a space between the termination of its fence and the fence of the adjacent owner, it violates its duty in fencing its right of way; and where a horse escaped by reason of defective fencing of that space, and went upon the track, where it was killed, the company is liable. Coleman v. Flint & P. M. R. Co. 7 West. Rep. 348, 44 Mich. 100.

Minnesota.

A railway company is liable for damages to an abutting farm, rendering its use less valuable, caused by a failure to fence its road. Nelson v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 41 Minn. 181.

The measure of damages is the depreciation in the rental value of the farm; and evidence of any fact tending to show how and to what extent the absence of a railway fence injuriously affected the value of such use is competent. Ibid.

The owner of animals killed by a railroad train is not chargeable with contributory negligence, where they escape and get upon an unfenced railroad track without his fault. Cox v. Minneapolis, B. & M. & A. R. Co. 41 Minn. 101.

Where a railroad occupies a public street in a city or village, it is not obliged or entitled to fence its tracks and thereby obstruct the street and interfere with its use. Rippe v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (Minn.) 5 L. R. A. 864.

Permitting a fence to become rotten is evidence plaintiff was guilty of negligence in allowing his horse to be upon the depot grounds, and that such negligence contributed to the accident, still, if you believe that the accident could have been avoided by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence on the part of the defendant, the defendant is liable."

The facts upon which this instruction was based were to this effect: That the evidence tended to show that the horse was, at the time he was struck by the locomotive, running at large on the depot grounds of the defendant in the Town of Tangent, and that the locomotive was attached to one of the regular passenger trains which passed through the town, north to south, at 1 o'clock P. M., and was upon the regular time; that the engineer signaled his approach to the station by sounding the whistle when about 300 yards distant therefrom, etc.; that the horse was, during all of said time, and prior to the first sounding of the whistle for the station, running at large at or near said depot grounds, and had, at different times previously to said day, been seen occasionally pasturing upon said depot grounds; that plaintiff resided in said town, and about 700 feet away from said depot grounds; that there is a conflict of evidence as to what the speed of the train was when said horse was first seen to go upon the track, and said alarm whistle was sounded, or as to whether or not said speed was slackened before the horse was overtaken by the locomotive, and as to whether or not the engineer endeavored to and could have stopped the train after the horse went upon the track, and before he was struck by the locomotive, the speed of the train when the horse went upon the track, and before he was struck by the locomotive, being variously estimated by witnesses at from eight to twenty miles per hour, and some of the witnesses testifying that the speed of the train was constantly lessened before the horse was struck, while other witnesses testified that they could not perceive that the speed of the train was at all diminished between the sounding of the alarm and the striking of the horse. The engineer testified that, immediately upon sounding the alarm whistle, he applied the brakes, reversed the engine and did all that was in his power to do towards stopping the train, which was running about three miles an hour when the horse was struck. Other witnesses testified—who were standing on the platform, some 300 yards distant—that the engineer did, and some that he did not, check the speed of the train before striking the horse.

These facts show (1) that the injury to the horse occurred on the track, on the depot grounds; and (2) that, as the horse had been seen prior to the day of the accident, occasionally, to pasture on the depot grounds, it is presumed that he was suffered to run at large with the consent of his owner, and strayed upon the track under the circumstances indicated; and (3) that there is a conflict of evidence as to whether the engineer endeavored to check the speed of the train before striking the horse, but none that he did not sound the alarm whistle, and turn the steam through the cylinder cocks, to drive the horse from the track. Upon this state of facts, the contention of the appellant

Under Gen. Stat. 1873, chap. 34, double costs may be allowed in the district court on appeal from justice's court, in cases of negligence in failing to fence a road. Schimmels v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 34 Minn. 216.

The statute does not make railroad companies liable for damages done by cattle trespassing upon their lands and passing thence, by reason of a failure to build fences, to the lands of adjoining owners. The liability in such case is upon the owner of the cattle. Gowan v. St. Paul, & T. F. R. Co. 35 Minn. 338.

Rev. Stat., § 600, giving double damages for injury to stock in consequence of the railroad company's failing to fence its line, is constitutional. Mo. Const. art. 2, § 20, 30, art. 4, § 38, art. 11, § 2; 16th Amend. U. S. Const. § 1; Hines v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 1 West. Rep. 754, 30 Mo. 629; Hamilton v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 1 West. A railroad company not fencing its right of way pursuant to General Statute neglects a public duty, and exposes itself to an action for damages resulting therefrom; and the imputed negligence is established by proving the point of injury and the absence of a fence. The Stock Law of 1883, to restrain domestic animals from running at large, constitutes no defense to the action. Boyle v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 4 West. Rep. 679, 33 Mo. App. 416.

It is the place where the animal got on the road, and not where it was killed, that fixes the liability of the company. Rev. Stat. § 600; Khret v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. R. R. Co. 2 West. Rep. 658, 30 Mo. App. 251.

Owners of stock are not required to keep up their cattle, or to keep them off the track. Davis v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. supra.

The Missouri Statute lays on railroad companies the obligation of fencing their tracks along "enclosed or cultivated fields." Wagn. Stat. 310, 311, § 42; Biggerstaff v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 60 Mo. 567. Compare Shelton v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 60 Mo. 412.

Rev. Stat. 1873, § 600, expressly requires defendant to fence uninclosed lands; and the facts that the mare which was injured by the cars strayed away from plaintiff's premises, got upon the commons, and thence found its way through the gate on the road, constitute no defense. Duncan v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 2 West. Rep. 322, 31 Mo. 67.

A railroad company is liable for neglect to fence, where the injury is inflicted by the cars of another corporation, operated by contractors in constructing the road. Silver v. Kansas City, St. L. & C. R. Co. 2 West. Rep. 254, 31 Mo. App. 4.

Where the issue was whether the animals got on the track at a point where it was required by law to erect and maintain a lawful fence, the question of negligence did not arise; defendant became amenable to the penalties of the statute, whether negligent or not. Smith v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 2 West. Rep. 308, 31 Mo. 53.

The statute gives the right to sue for injury occurring anywhere on the road, except where it was inclosed by a lawful fence, or crossed by any public highway. Radcliffe v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 7 West. Rep. 308, 30 Mo. 127.

It exalts of the railroad company a degree of 6a, (1) that the depot grounds are not included within the intention of the law requiring railroads to be fenced; and (2) that the plaintiff, in allowing his horse to run at large, and stray upon the depot grounds and track, where he was killed by a moving train, was guilty of contributory negligence which precludes his right of recovery.

The language of the Statute making railroad companies liable for killing stock "upon or near any unfenced track of any railroad in this State, whenever such killing or injury is caused by any moving train or engine or cars upon such track," is broad enough to include that part of the track which is contiguous to its stations or depots. Or. Code, §§ 4044, 4045.

Taking it literally, the Statute would apply to the entire track of the railroad, which would necessarily include such parts of the track as lie upon its depot or station grounds, thereby rendering the railroad company absolutely liable to the owner of any stock injured for an omission to fence its track upon its depot or station grounds. But such a construction is not consistent with the reason of the Statute, or the intention of this enactment. In view of the business transactions at depot grounds, it is as much for the public convenience that it should be opened and unfenced as public highways, to which, applying the strict letter of the law, the Statute would also extend at the places where the railroad track crosses such highways. The purposes for which these are to be used, and the right of public convenience, are inconsistent with the obligations to fence at such places, or to incur the liability created by the Statute, and cannot, therefore, be held to apply to depot grounds, nor to public road crossings, nor to the streets of cities or villages.

In Davis v. Burlington & M. R. R. Co., 26 Iowa, 554, Wright, J., said: "The language is, 'its road,' and we do not believe that this includes depot grounds. True, these grounds, including switches, side tracks, etc., may be a part of the road. This is not denied for many purposes, and, indeed, most purposes. And yet we cannot think that the Legislature contemplated these as a part of the 'road' by the Statute under consideration." Within the principle thus declared, on account of the impracticability of fencing such places, we do not think the Statute applies to depot grounds; and so it has often been held by the courts. 1 Rorer, Railroads, 623, 628, and note; *Atkinson, T. & S. Nebraska.

The provisions of Neb. Comp. Stat., art. 2, chap. 2, § 12, defining a "lawful fence," apply alone to the inclosing of lands, and do not apply to the fencing of a railway. That matter is governed by Neb. Comp. Stat., chap. 72, art. 1, § 1. Chicago, R. & Q. R. Co. v. James (Neb.) March 20, 1890.

This latter Statute requires every railroad company in the State to maintain fences on the sides of its railway, except at the crossings of public roads and highways, and within the limits of towns, cities and villages, etc. Ibid.

The company is not required to fence its tracks within the limits of a city. Chicago, R. & Q. R. Co. v. Hogan (Neb.) Nov. 4, 1890.

§ Nor is there anything in the complaint or record to indicate that a recovery in damage is sought, or any liability created by the Statute, or other than the ordinary action to recover damages for negligence.

Upon the next question, namely, that the plaintiff, in allowing his horse to run at large, so that he strayed upon the track, was guilty of contributory negligence, and is precluded from a recovery, the authorities are not agreed. There seems, however, to be a line of distinction between them which accounts for this difference in principle, which, perhaps, would not exist without it; and this is, whether the common-law rule, which requires the owner of stock to keep them in his own close, at his peril, prevails in the jurisdiction or not. Of course, in any of them, this relates only to such cases as are not within the statutory obligation to fence, or such places as are excepted from its operation. In those jurisdictions in which the common-law rule prevails, that the owner of cattle is bound to keep them in his own inclosure, it is quite generally held that if he suffers them to go at large, and the cattle stray upon the railroad track, and are injured or killed, the company is not liable unless the conduct of its agents in the management of the train was wanton or willful. In such cases the cattle are regarded as unlawfully at large, and exposed to danger by the fault of the owner, which, in the event of their destruction by collision with the locomotive while on the track of the railroad, is considered as the direct consequence of his negligence, which will preclude a right of recovery in him for their loss, although it may have occurred through the negligence or want of care of the railroad company.

In Tonawanda R. Co. v. Munger, 5 Denio, 255, which was an action to recover damages for negligence in killing the plaintiff's oxen by running over them by a train while on the track of the defendant, the court, after reaching the conclusion that the oxen, when killed, were trespassing on the land of the defendant, under the common-law rule that the owner of cattle is bound, at his peril, to keep them off the land of other persons, says (Beardsley, Ch. J.): "It is not pretended the act was done designedly by the persons in charge, but simply that it occurred through their negligence and want of care. It is a well-settled rule of law that such an action cannot be sustained if the wrongful act of the plaintiff co-operated with the mis-tion of the Railroad Act of 1834, § 2, chap. 282, Laws 1834, is not confined to an action for damages given by said Act; but he may enforce the performance of this duty to fence. Jones v. Seligman, 61 N. Y. 122.

Wisconsin.

Under the Wisconsin Statute exempting depot grounds from the necessity of fencing, a railroad company need not fence its grounds on the main line of the railroad, on which are situated a water tank, a building containing a telegraph and ticket office, and a place for eating and sleeping, which is occupied by its station men and telegraph and ticket agent, and a platform at which trains stop to receive and discharge passengers and freight. Peters v. Stewart, 73 Wis. 122.

conduct of the defendants or their servants to produce the damage sustained. I do not mean that the co-operating act of the plaintiff must be wrong in intention to call for the application of this principle, for such is not the law. The act may have been one of mere negligence on his part. Still, he cannot recover. . . . But injuries inflicted by design are not thus to be excused. A wrong-doer is not necessarily an outlaw, but may justly complain of wanton and malicious mischief. Negligence, however, even when gross, is but an omission of duty. It is not designed and intentional mischief, although it may be cogent evidence of such an act. Of the latter, a trespasser may complain, although he cannot be allowed to do so in regard to the former."

In Brewster v. Troy & R. R. Co., 37 Barb. 319, it is held that one who voluntarily suffers his cow to go at large in the public street, with no one to take charge of her, and to stray upon a railroad track at a time when cars are passing, is guilty of carelessness, and cannot recover for injuries to the cow, happening through the negligence of the railroad company, not amounting to gross negligence, Miller, J., saying: "His own act and negligence contributed to produce the injury complained of, and caused the death of the cow; and there is no evidence of gross negligence on the part of the defendant."

In Maynard v. Boston & M. R. Co., 115 Mass. 400, Gray, C. J., said: "If the horse had been rightfully upon the defendant's land, it would have been their duty to exercise reasonable care to avoid injuring the horse. But, it being admitted by the plaintiff that his horse was trespassing upon the railroad, they did not owe him that duty, and were not liable to him for anything short of reckless and wanton misconduct of those employed in the management of their train."

As the plaintiff is bound at common law to keep his cattle within his own inclosure, and liable for all damages done by them when they stray upon the lands of others, he is the party in fault; and it results, if he suffers them to stray upon the track of a railroad, they are there without right, and as trespassers, through his wrongful conduct, and, if injured or killed by the negligence of the railroad or its agents, in the management of the train, he must abide the consequences, upon the ground that the defendant Company owes no duty of care to trespassing cattle on their tracks, except not wantonly or willfully to destroy them, and that, in permitting the cattle to be at large wrongfully or by his own fault, he has contributed to produce the injury of which he complains, and is precluded from a recovery. When such a state of facts exists, nothing but willfulness on the part of the agents of the Company, or, as the authorities sometimes put it, such negligence as would amount to willfulness, would make the Company liable in damages for the killing of cattle upon its track, so exposed by the fault of their owner. *Indianapolis, C. & L. In some of the cases, and especially the older ones, the term "gross negligence" is used as the equivalent of "willful negligence," as used by the later authorities, which imports act or conduct that is willful or wanton, and to which the doctrine of contributory negligence has no application; for, when the injury done the plaintiff is occasioned by the willful and wanton act of the defendant, the negligence of the plaintiff is no defense; and so it is held by the cases referred to, with perhaps some slight exceptions as to cattle trespassing on the track of railroads. As a result of this class of cases, in the States in which the common-law rule prevails, it is generally considered that allowing cattle to run at large is such negligence as precludes a recovery. On the other hand, in those jurisdictions or States in which the common-law rule as to the duty of the owner of stock to keep them on his own inclosure is abrogated, it is generally held that a plaintiff, in permitting his stock to run at large, commits no unlawful act, nor is guilty of an omission of ordinary care; and if they stray upon the uninclosed track of a railroad, and are injured and killed, although they may be regarded as trespassers, he is not guilty of contributory negligence; but that the company is liable for their loss, unless it exercised ordinary care and skill in the management of its trains to prevent their injury or destruction. It is considered, as the act of the plaintiff in suffering his stock to run at large is not unlawful or negligent, nor likewise the act of the defendant in leaving its track uninclosed, yet, when it is so, as the stock may stray upon it as other uninclosed places, the defendant takes the risk of such intrusion upon its track, and the owner the risk of injury to his stock by unavoidable accident, but not of negligence or want of ordinary care; hence the conclusion that railroad companies are liable for the ordinary negligence of their servants. In all such cases and jurisdictions where the common-law rule is not in force, and the owner of stock may allow them to run at large without violating the law, or being guilty of negligence, if such stock stray on an uninclosed track, and are killed by the train, when, by the exercise of ordinary care, that loss or result might have been avoided, the negligence of the railroad company is regarded as the proximate cause of the injury, and the act of the owner in suffering them to run at large as too remotely connected with the negligence of the defendant to constitute contributory negligence, or be operative as such a defense. Such acts are not the immediate cause of the injury or loss of property, nor do they concur and combine at the time with the negligence of the company, as the natural and probable consequence of it, but at most bear only a remote relation to it, which, when stock is on its track, does not release the company from its obligation of reasonable care to avoid injuring them, at least to the extent that the law requires, and common justice and humanity demand, of others, when stock is trespassing upon their lands, not to injure or kill it, if by ordinary care they could prevent it. When the company is not bound to fence, the measure of liability is ordinary care; and, though stock have no right to be on the track, especially when required for use of its trains, yet the company enjoys no special privileges over other owners of lands, and is under the same obligation to exercise care to avoid injuring them, consistent with its duties in the management of the train.

In Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Finley, 37 Ark. 509, it is held that it is the duty of an engineer of a train to keep a careful and constant lookout for stock upon the track, and, although such be wrongfully there, yet he must use ordinary care and diligence to discover it, and avoid injury to it, or the company will be liable for the injury done. The court says: "A very prudent person might not, perhaps, allow his stock to go at large in the immediate vicinity of a railroad, and one who does so may not be altogether free from negligence, yet he assumes only the risk of an accident which might not be avoided by ordinary care and watchfulness of the agents or employees of the railroad company."

In Bloom v. Dubuque & S. O. R. Co., 31 Iowa, 108, where the action was for damages sustained by killing the plaintiff's cattle by running the cars over them at a point where the public highway crossed the defendant's road, it was held that, if the cattle were not on the track by the negligence of the plaintiff, the test of the defendant's liability is whether, at the time of the accident, reasonable and proper care was exercised to avoid the injury.

In Scurles v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co., 35 Iowa, 491, which was an action for negligence in killing the plaintiff's ox by a freight train on a public highway crossing, error was assigned for refusal to give, among others, this instruction: "Railroad trains, when cattle are on the track, are not required to slacken their speed, or to make signals by blowing the whistle or ringing the bell at road crossings, or places where the road has not a right to fence;" and Day, J., said: "It was held, at a very early period in the judicial history of this State, that the mere fact of permitting cattle to go at large is not a ground of imputing negligence to the owner. . . . A railway company is liable for injuries resulting from the careless or negligent management of its trains, where the injured party does not by his own negligence contribute to the injury. It is a corollary of these two propositions that a railway company must respond in damages for injuries to stock through its negligence, where the owner has contributed to the injury no further than merely permitting it to run at large."

In Cincinnati & Z. R. Co. v. Smith, 29 Ohio St. 297, it was held that the servants of a railroad company in operating its trains are bound to use ordinary care to avoid injury to domestic animals trespassing on the track; and the court says: "If the servants of the company in charge of the train, having due regard to their duties for the safety of the persons and property in their charge, could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have seen and saved the horses, we think they were bound to have done so."

Va. 268, which was an action for negligence in killing a horse on a railroad track, the court, after remarking that the rule of the common law requiring the owners of animals to keep them on his own land had never been in force in West Virginia, being inconsistent with its legislation, among other things, said: "The remote negligence of the plaintiff will not prevent his recovering for an injury to his property immediately caused by the negligence of the defendant. The negligence of the plaintiff that defeats a recovery must be a proximate cause of the injury. Suffering domestic animals to run at large, by means whereof they stray upon an uninclosed railway track, where they are killed by a train, is not, in general, a proximate cause of the loss; and hence, although there may have been some negligence in the owner's permitting the animals to go at large, such negligence being only a remote cause of the loss, it will not prevent his recovering from the railroad company the value of the animals, if the immediate cause of their death or injury was negligence of the company's servants in conducting the train."

The same language was used in Cleveland, C. & C. R. Co. v. Elliott, 4 Ohio St. 475; and see also Kerwacker v. Cleveland, C. & C. R. Co., 8 Ohio St. 173, in which the principles of the law under discussion were set forth with great ability, and much force and cogency of reasoning.

In Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Mulligan, 45 Md. 498, a State in which it is the duty of owners of cattle to keep them within their inclosure, yet, in an action for damages for the loss of a cow run over by the cars of the defendant, Robinson, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "No one has the right to complain of injury to cattle or other stock which he has permitted to stray upon a railroad track, unless such injury can be avoided consistently with these higher and paramount duties resting upon the company [not to endanger its passengers]. What we mean to say and to decide is this: that it is the duty of the company to exercise reasonable care to avoid injury to cattle or stock found on its road, though such cattle and stock may be there through the negligence of the owner."

So, too, in Trow v. Vermont Cent. R. Co., 34 Vt. 494, the court says: "When the negligence of the defendants is proximate, and that of the plaintiff remote, the action can then well be sustained, although the plaintiff is not entirely without fault. This seems now to be settled in England and in this country. Therefore, if there be negligence on the part of the plaintiff, yet if, at the time when the injury was committed, it might have been avoided by the defendant, in the exercise of reasonable care and prudence, an action will lie for the injury. So, in this case, if the plaintiff were guilty of negligence, or even of positive wrong, in placing his horse in the road, the defendants were bound to the exercise of reasonable care and diligence in the use of their road and management of the engine and train; and if, for want of that care, the injury arose, they are liable."

"The railroad," said Redfield, Ch. J., "cannot justify either recklessness, want of common care at the time and after the cattle are discovered or wanton injury." Jackson v. Rutland & B. R. Co. 25 Vt. 161.

"The negligence," said Baldwin, J., "which disables the owner to sue, must be negligence which directly or by natural consequences conduces to the injury. It is not easy for us to see, therefore, that the mere fact that a party suffers his cows to go at large near the line of a railroad, is such negligence as to excuse the corporation from reasonable diligence and care to avoid injury to them when they happen to be on the track. The suffering them to go at large certainly is not the usual or natural cause of such an injury. Such a result would not probably happen once in a thousand, or perhaps ten thousand, times."

The general conclusion to be deduced from this case is that the fact of merely permitting cattle to run at large near the line of a railway is not enough to excuse the company from the exercise of ordinary care and diligence to avoid injuring them when they may happen to stray upon its track, consistently with a due regard for the safety of its trains and passengers, that such acts upon the part of the owner of cattle are too remotely related to the negligence of the defendant to concur and combine with it as the proximate cause of the injury, and, in the sense of the law, do not constitute contributory negligence; but that the failure of the company to exercise ordinary care and diligence under the circumstances is the immediate or proximate cause of the injury or loss of property, and renders the company liable for its negligence. So manifest is the justice of this requirement, not to injure or kill stock which may happen to stray upon the track, if, by the exercise of ordinary care, it can be prevented, that in some jurisdictions, as we have shown, in which the common-law rule prevails as to the duty of owners to keep their stock within their inclosures, it has been adopted and applied. So that, speaking generally, it may be said that a railroad company is liable in damages for injury to stock caused by its negligence, where the owner has contributed to the injury no further than merely permitting them to run at large. Vicksburg & J. R. Co. v. Fulton, 31 Miss. 166; Gorman v. Pacific R. Co. 20 Mo. 441; Trout v. Virginia & T. R. Co. 23 Gratt. 623; Isbell v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 27 Conn. 303; South & North Ala. R. Co. v. Williams, 65 Ala. 74; Rockford, R. I. & St. L. R. Co. v. Irish, 73 Ill. 404; Kentucky Cent. R. Co. v. Labus, 14 Bush, 318; McCoy v. California Pac. R. Co. 40 Cal. 522; 1 Thomp. Neg. 406; Beach, Contrib. Neg. § 73.

Now, upon the facts, within which line of reasoning does the case before us come? It has been held that the common-law rule requiring every man to keep his stock within his inclosure is not in force in this State. Campbell v. Bridwell, 3 Or. 312.

It is a matter of common knowledge that it is not only the general understanding but the custom of the people to allow their stock to run at large, and from the first settlement of the State until the present time all kinds of stock have been allowed to run at large on uninclosed lands. Besides, our legislation in relation to the inclosures, estrays and the marking and branding of stock are inconsistent with its existence in this State. It is not, then, a violation of law, nor a want of ordinary care, merely to allow stock to run at large in this State; and, unless some special circumstances exist, no one, individual nor corporation, may injure or kill them when they stray upon his uninclosed lands, or its railroad track, without incurring liability in damages therefor, unless ordinary care and diligence was exerted to prevent it.

As applied to the facts in hand, within the reasoning of the authorities, the plaintiff's horse was not a trespasser, in the common-law sense, when he strayed on the track near or on the depot grounds; nor, within the intention of the Statute, as we have shown, was the defendant under any obligation to fence its depot grounds so as to exclude the horse or other stock. It is conceded that the defendant had a right to its track, and while, as it was said in Smith v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co., 34 Iowa, 506, "while the plaintiff's cattle had no right there, though, negatively stated, they were not in the wrong for being there," yet that circumstance did not relieve the defendant of the duty to exercise ordinary care; and, if the horse was killed, while thus on the track, by its negligence, the defendant is liable. The original act being neither negligent nor unlawful, when the horse strayed upon the track, and was killed, the act of the plaintiff was not the direct nor proximate cause of the injury, and could not, therefore, be such negligence as would operate as a defense and preclude a recovery. To effect that result, there must have been mutual negligence, in the sense of equivalent acts simultaneously concurring to produce the injury. Before that can happen, the original act of turning loose the cattle or stock must have been done under such circumstances as indicated a want of ordinary care upon the part of the plaintiff that contributed directly to produce the injury. Ordinary care always has relation to the situation of the parties, and necessarily varies according to the particular circumstances under which it is exercised. An owner cannot turn loose his stock regardless of circumstances, or at a place where danger to them is constant and imminent, and, when an injury occurs to them as a consequence of his conduct, though the defendant may not have been free from fault, escape the charge of negligence, or a want of ordinary care. There is a marked difference between suffering stock to run at large upon uninclosed lands along the line of a railroad, or adjoining its depot grounds, from which they may stray upon the track, and turning them loose, uncared for, and directly upon the grounds of a depot or station covered with main and side tracks, switches, turn-outs and turn-tables, more or less constantly in use, with trains coming and going, where danger is known to exist, and where injury to them will probably happen as a consequence of the peril in which they have been voluntarily placed. In the former case, if they are killed by the negligence of the company, the act of the plaintiff is only the remote cause of the injury, while in the latter it is the proximate cause of the injury, co-operating with the negligence of the defendant to produce it. In such case, the act itself is equivalent to deliberately putting the stock in a place of danger, and where injury to them is a prob-

the consequence. The stock do not stray into a place of danger, but they are turned loose into a place where danger is known to exist, or may be foreseen by the exercise of ordinary care, and the party cannot and ought not to recover for injuries which are the direct result of his own negligence. While, therefore, an owner may suffer his stock to run at large, and pasture upon uninclosed lands, if they should stray upon the track of a railway, and be injured or killed by the negligence of the company it is not considered such negligence as directly conduces to the injury, and does not preclude a right of recovery, yet there may be circumstances under which to turn stock loose, merely for, would indicate such recklessness or such want of ordinary care as would preclude a recovery.

Now, turning to the record, we have presumed, without any direct evidence of the fact, that the plaintiff suffered his horse to run at large, and that he wandered upon the depot grounds and the track where the accident occurred. The record shows that he was running back and along, and upon the track, and away from the train, when he was struck, on the depot grounds, from forty to sixty feet from the place where he started on the track; that when the train was about 300 yards distant, and signaled its approach to the station by blowing its whistle, the horse then was either upon the depot grounds alongside of the track, or else was upon the public road and soon thereafter was seen upon the track. Within the principles of the authorities where it is not lawful to allow stock to run at large, "a railroad company must respond in damages for injuries to stock through its negligence when the owner has contributed to the injury no further than merely permitting it to run at large." Is there anything in the record to except the case from the operation of this principle. There is no suggestion upon the facts, or any special circumstances, which made the conduct of the plaintiff in the premises negligent, or to charge him with a want of ordinary care. The place where the injury occurred was not a railway station in a thickly-populated community, near to or adjoining some large and thriving town, settled with tracks and switches and turnouts, at which a volume of business was done, requiring the constant use of its depot grounds for its trains passing and repassing, and where danger to roaming stock could be foreseen, and where to turn them loose would be voluntarily putting them where injury to them would be the natural and probable consequence.

We concur in the case of Smith v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co., 84 Iowa, 818, to which we have been referred, that "the owner of cattle may not turn them out, and enable them to frequent a place of great peril on the depot grounds or track of a railroad company, and then demand that the railroad company shall stop its trains, and drive off his cattle, or shorten the speed, or change the time-table in order to deliver his cattle from the peril in which he has voluntarily placed them." But it must not be overlooked that the court immediately added that, "if the injury to the cattle was caused by the negligence of those having charge of the train, and which injury might have been avoided by the use of ordinary diligence and care, then of course, the plaintiff might recover." The use of the words in the last clause of the instruction, "and that such negligence contributed to the accident," was not in the sense of such negligence as was the proximate cause of the injury, and operative as a defense, but only as a remote cause of the injury, and would not preclude a recovery. The instruction must be examined by the light of the facts to which it is applied, and the circumstance of allowing the horse to run at large, except under special circumstances not raised by this record, is not an omission of ordinary care; and the law is, when a railroad company has injured stock through its negligence, that it is liable, where the owner has contributed to the injury no further than merely permitting his stock to run at large.

There is a large class of cases, headed by Devine v. Mesa, 10 Mesa & W. 548,—a case much criticised, but which Judge Thompson shows has been approved by the great weight of authority (5 South. Law Rev. 835),—in which the principle is upheld as declared by Lord Abinger, that, "as the defendant might by proper care have avoided injuring the animal, and did not, he is liable for the consequences of his negligence, though the animal may have been improperly there," and which, as applied to the present case, is conclusive of the result already reached. And it may be observed, further, that that case and others were subsequently reviewed and considered by the court of exchequer in Tuff v. Warman, 5 C. B. N. S. 673; and it was held that mere negligence or want of ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff would not disentitle him to recover, if the defendant might, by the exercise of ordinary care and caution, have avoided the neglect or carelessness of the plaintiff. And, in a still later and much discussed case (Radley v. London & N. W. R. Co., L. R. 1 App. Cas. 730), it was held error to instruct the jury, if there was contributory negligence in the plaintiff, they should find for the defendant, without adding the qualification, "unless the defendant could have avoided the mischief by the exercise of reasonable care." Lord Penzance said: "The first proposition is a general one, to this effect: that the plaintiff, in an action for negligence, cannot succeed if it is found by the jury that he has himself been guilty of any negligence, or want of ordinary care which contributed to cause the accident. But there is another proposition equally well established, and it is a qualification upon the first; namely, that, though the plaintiff may have been guilty of negligence, and although that negligence may in fact have contributed to the accident, yet, if the defendant could, in the result, by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, have avoided the mischief which happened, the plaintiff's negligence will not excuse him."

As applied to the facts in hand, the defendant is required to avoid the destruction of life and property, if by ordinary care it may be safely done, or else it will be liable, though the plaintiff may have been negligent. Wharton, Neg. § 979, note 5.

So cogently has this principle—that no person or corporation had the right to recklessly inflict wrong, or to destroy the property or animale of another, even when trespassing, if by the exercise of ordinary care it may be avoided, with due regard to the safety of the train—impressed itself upon the justice and humanity of courts, that it has been adopted and applied in some jurisdictions where the common law rule prevails, which requires the owner to keep his stock within his inclosure. Within the doctrine of these cases, although the present case does not require us to invoke it, the instruction is incontestably sustained by the law. As no other question is presented by the record, or made at the argument, it follows that the judgment must be affirmed.

Thayer, Ch. J., dissenting:

I am unable to concur in the result reached by the majority of the members of the court in this case. I cannot assent to the view that an owner of domestic animals can pasture them upon the depot grounds of a railroad company without being chargeable with such a degree of negligence as will preclude his right to a recovery of damages for their injury or destruction by moving trains of cars upon the track of the road, unless done intentionally. There is no stronger evidence to my mind of carelessness and negligence upon the part of such owner than to allow the animals to go at large, and wander about such places, where they are necessarily exposed to being run over and killed. My learned associate who prepared the majority opinion herein has with great care and research collated a large number of both English and American authorities upon the subject, and draws as a conclusion therefrom that where the common-law rule, which required the owner of stock to keep it within his own inclosure, did not prevail, his permitting it to run at large would not, if it were to stray upon a railroad track, and receive injury, necessarily be such negligence as directly contributed to the injury, and he attempts to show that the common law rule referred to does not obtain in this State. As an abstract proposition, I make no contention respecting that view; but, in the determination of all this class of cases, we must look squarely at the facts and circumstances, in order to make a just decision. Theories and distinctions, however specious and refined, cannot disprove a self-evident truth.

It appears from the bill of exceptions that the respondent has lost two horses, which have been run over and killed by rail-cars upon the road in question; and it is very evident that if he had a large band, and took no better care of them than he did of the one in question, as shown by the testimony, he would lose them all in the same way, unless the Company ceased to operate its road, and turned its depot grounds into a horse pasture. The bill of exceptions states that "the evidence tended to show that said horse, at the time when he was struck by defendant's locomotive, was running at large on defendant's depot grounds in the Town of Tangent, Linn County, . . . and had at different times previously to said day been seen occasionally pasturing upon said depot grounds, that plaintiff resided at all times in said Town of Tangent, and 700 or 800 feet away from said depot grounds."

This court knows judicially that the railroad in question constitutes a part of a line of road extending from Portland, Or., to San Francisco, Cal., a distance of more than 700 miles, and is the main avenue of transportation of passengers and freight between the two States; that, in operating it, a large number of trains of cars and rolling stock are employed, and that, at all such points as that in question, horses and cattle could not be permitted to pasture upon its depot grounds with any degree of security, however vigilant and careful those having charge of the trains and rolling stock might be in regard to their management. Yet the respondent, living in said Town of Tangent, within a few hundred feet of the place where his horse was killed, permits it to run at large upon the lands of the Company adjoining the depot, which must necessarily be left open, in order to enable the public to transact business with the Company. To conclude that such act, under the circumstances, is not the result of supine indifference and negligence upon the part of the owner of the animal would, it seems to me, be absurd, and to stultify reason. The respondent probably resided upon a town lot, and, having no ground to pasture his horse upon, concluded he might forage upon the Company's land. He knew, of course, that he had no right to allow his horse to run there; knew that he was exposing the animal to imminent peril by doing so. But the opportunity was so favorable for nipping herbage from another's land free of expense that he was willing to take the risk of sacrificing the life of the horse. I can conceive of no carelessness more censurable than to allow horses and cattle to run at large in such a locality, and no prudent man would think of permitting it, out of regard for the beasts themselves. But there are other far more important considerations than the regard for the animals, and their value. These things are incomparable to the damage liable to accrue in consequence of running an engine and train of cars over such animals. Several employes upon railroads have lost their lives during the last year or two from such incidents, and thousands of dollars of damage done. Cars have been thrown from the track, and the lives of passengers jeopardized. A railroad company can ill afford to run its engine and cars over an animal, and will not do so, where it can possibly be avoided, whether liable for its value or not. The respondent had no legal or moral right to suffer his horse to be at large upon a railroad company's depot grounds. He was thereby doing the Company and the public a positive wrong, and I am opposed to his being rewarded for his unjustifiable negligence in that particular. That his act in allowing the animal to go where it did directly contributed to the damage he seeks to recover, and which the jury graciously awarded to him, there can be no doubt, if viewed from a common-sense stand point. This is not a case involving the right of stock to run at large upon a range or open common. There the land is thrown open, or left open, by the voluntary act of the proprietor, which is construed to be an implied license to the owners of domestic animals to use the same for grazing purposes. But here the Railroad Company is compelled to leave its depot grounds open, for the accommodation of the public, for the purposes of receiving and delivering freight, and for the convenience of persons traveling upon it. The grounds being left uninclosed, under such circumstances, can not be construed into a license to pasture them, and the conditions are of such a character as to impliedly forbid it.

Nor do I oppose the view expressed in the said opinion regarding the duty of employes of a railroad company to use reasonable effort at all times to prevent the injury or destruction of such animals when found upon the track of the road, although they are there wrongfully. Because cattle or horses go upon a railroad track through the negligence of their owner, it does not follow that the company has the right to kill them. Its employes should always avoid running them down, where they are able to stop the train without injury to it, or without endangering the safety of passengers. But I am decidedly opposed to a trial court referring such a question to a jury, unless there is evidence in the case tending to establish the fact that they could reasonably and safely have stopped the train.

The majority members of the court assume that the evidence in this case tended to prove that the managers of the train, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, could have obviated the casualty in question. I very much doubt, however, whether it warrants that assumption. The statement in the bill of exceptions in regard to that matter is as follows: "That said locomotive was at the time attached to one of defendant's regular passenger trains, which passed through said town and depot grounds, from north to south, about 1 o'clock P. M. of the day, which was the regular time for said train to pass said station at Tazewell; that, upon approaching said station, and when about 300 yards distant therefrom, the engineer in charge of the train signaled his approach to said station by sounding the whistle, that said horse was at the time either upon the depot grounds alongside the track, or else was upon the public road, at the north boundary line of the depot grounds, and soon thereafter was seen upon the track of the railroad, on the depot grounds, which track, near the road, was elevated some ten or twelve feet, and at the place where the horse was struck was elevated six or eight feet above the surrounding ground; that soon after the whistle was sounded the horse was so seen upon the track between the last-named two points on the depot grounds, and was walking along towards the approaching train, as if intending to reach said county road, which crosses the railroad track at that point; that when the horse had progressed a few steps in that direction upon the track the engineer sounded the alarm whistle twice or oftener, and turned the steam through the cylinder cocks, to drive the horse from the track; that the horse was at that time from sixteen to sixty feet from said road, and the train was distant from the horse from 150 to 250 feet on the opposite side of the said county road; that when the engineer so sounded the alarm whistle the horse turned immediately around on the track, and started running back along and upon the track, towards the south, and away from the train, but was overtaken and struck by the train within from forty to sixty feet from where he so turned around on the track; . . . that there is a conflict of evidence as to what the speed of the train was when said horse was first seen to go upon the track, and said alarm whistle was sounded, and as to whether or not said speed was slackened before the horse was overtaken and struck by the locomotive, and as to whether or not the engineer endeavored to and could have stopped the train after the horse went upon the track, and before he was struck by the locomotive, the speed of the train when the horse went upon the track being variously estimated by witnesses at from eight to twenty miles per hour, and some of the witnesses testified that the speed of the train was considerably lessened before the horse was struck, while other witnesses testified that they could not perceive that the speed of the train was at all diminished between the sounding of the alarm whistle and the striking of the horse. The engineer testified that immediately upon sounding the alarm whistle he applied the brakes, reversed the engine, and did all that it was in his power to do towards stopping the train, which was running about three miles per hour when the horse was struck. The other witnesses who testified were standing on the depot platform, some 300 feet distant from the point where the horse was struck by the locomotive, and nearly in a direct line with the length of the approaching train; and some of them stated that they did not, and some of them that they did, think the engineer endeavored to check the speed of the train before striking the horse."

I do not think the jury were justified in finding from the facts, under the most favorable construction to the respondent which they could reasonably give him, that the employes of the Company in charge of the train were guilty of violating their duty in the particular referred to. I do not believe that the facts were sufficient to sustain an allegation that said employes, by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence, could have avoided striking the horse with the locomotive. A finding by the jury that a train was running at the maximum or minimum rate supposed by the witnesses, or any intermediate rate, per hour, when the alarm whistle was sounded, and that it was 250 feet from the horse at the time,—the greatest estimated distance,—and that the engineer was not endeavoring to stop it, and could have done so, after the horse went upon the track, and before it was struck by the locomotive, would not have been sufficient to establish such want of care or negligence; as it would have lacked the further essential fact that the train could have been stopped within the distance indicated, and upon that character of grade, without danger of wrecking it, and imperiling the safety of those on board. An engineer of a railroad train is charged with a responsible duty, and he must be the judge, in the event of an emergency, as to the proper course to be pursued. He is often compelled, in cases of threatened danger from causes such as existed in this case, to accelerate instead of retarding the speed of the train, in order to save his own life, and the lives of others depending in a great measure upon his prudence and discretion. It would therefore be highly unjust to impute negligence to his conduct in the performance of his duty, without proof of all the facts necessary to constitute it. It could hardly be supposed that a person intrusted to an important station as that of engineer upon a passenger train of cars would neglect to check the speed of the train in order to avoid running over a horse discovered upon the track, where it could be effectually and safely done. No one knows better than the engineer himself that his own life is in imminent peril whenever such an occurrence happens; and the law of self preservation, if no other consideration, would prevent him from voluntarily taking such a risk. I think it may reasonably be claimed, as a rule of evidence in such cases, that the engineer is presumed to have performed his duty, unless the contrary is shown by direct and positive proof. In this case, however, no proof of any neglect on the part of the engineer, or of any of the employees of the Company, was attempted to be established, except by remote inference, not deducible from the facts claimed. It seems to me, therefore, that when the circuit court gave the instruction: "In this case, if you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence in allowing his horse to be upon the depot grounds of defendant, and that such negligence contributed to the accident, still, if you believe the accident could have been avoided by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence on the part of the defendant, the defendant is liable,"—it committed error. Cases of this kind are too important to the public to be left wholly to the decision of a jury, who, in ninety nine cases out of a hundred, will determine them from sympathy, prejudice and caprice. Courts have a responsibility to perform aside from announcing abstract propositions of law. It is the duty of a trial court, and of this court, to see that justice is administered; and it cannot be shirked by a pretext that the case was a proper one to be determined by the jury. In the trial of actions at law, where the testimony in support of the issue is conflicting, it is the province of the jury to determine the facts; but the court should always carefully scan the testimony, and ascertain upon what issues between the parties it is conflicting, and not shuffle the whole responsibility onto the jury. The instruction above set out left the jury, in this case, free to determine it according to their own notions of right, and without regard to the rules of law.

The court had refused to give the instruction requested by the appellant's counsel,—that it was negligence in the owner of a horse to voluntarily permit it to run at large, and seek pasturage upon railroad depot grounds, and, if it were unintentionally injured by the employees of the railroad, through negligence in operating its cars, while the horse was so trespassing upon such grounds, the owner of the horse could not recover damages from the Railroad Company for such injury,—and after such refusal proceeded to tell the jury that, if they believed from the evidence that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence in allowing his horse to be upon the depot grounds of defendant, and that such negligence contributed to the accident, still, etc. By this instruction, the question as to whether or not the plaintiff was guilty of negligence in allowing his horse to be upon the depot grounds of defendant, and that such negligence contributed to the accident,—a very important question of law, indeed,—was left entirely to the belief of the jury from the evidence. Yet this part of the instruction is less objectionable than the latter clause thereof, as it restricts the jury in their finding, whether the plaintiff was guilty of negligence on account of the act referred to, and whether such negligence contributed to the accident, to their belief from the evidence, while the latter clause, to the effect that, if they believed that the accident would have been avoided, etc., would indicate that they might find the defendant liable from general belief, or belief derived from any source. The rule that a railroad company may be liable for killing stock upon its road, although wrongfully there, does not arise out of any new principle. It has always been recognized as a wholesome doctrine that an owner of property had no right to destroy or mistreat another's cattle found trespassing upon the property, but must exercise reasonable care and prudence in removing them.

The issue in this case was to this effect: The plaintiff said to the defendant: "My horse, without any fault of mine, went upon your railroad track; and your agents and servants so carelessly and negligently ran and managed your locomotive and cars upon said track that the same were run against the horse, and thereby killed it, to my damage," etc. The defendant said, in answer thereto: "My agents and servants were not guilty of the alleged carelessness and negligence, but the damage of which you complain resulted from your own carelessness and negligence." Now, the plaintiff having failed to charge an intentional injury to his animal, should, in order to avail himself of the rule which allows a recovery, in such cases, in favor of a party guilty of contributory negligence on his part, have averred in the reply that, notwithstanding the alleged carelessness and negligence charged against him in the answer, he was still entitled to recover the value of his horse, for that the agents and servants of the defendant might and could, by the exercise of reasonable efforts, have avoided running the locomotive against the animal, and that they wholly failed to make such efforts. This would have presented the real issue in the case—an issue tendered by the plaintiff, and which he would have been compelled to maintain by a preponderance of evidence; but he tendered no such issue in his reply. Upon the contrary, he merely denied the allegation of his own carelessness and negligence in the affair. The court, however, cast the burden upon the defendant of proving, not only that the plaintiff was guilty of carelessness and negligence which contributed to the injury, but virtually required the defendant to show that it could not have avoided the accident by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence. The said instruction substantially, went to that effect. It was to the effect that, if the jury found the plaintiff was guilty of negligence in the affair, "and that such negligence contributed to the accident, still the defendant was liable, if the jury believed that it could have been avoided by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence on the part of the defendant." Under that view, a plea on the part of a defendant, in an action against him for negligence, that the plaintiff was also guilty of negligence, which contributed to the injury, would not be good unless it were averred in the plea, also, that the result could not have been avoided by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence on the part of the defendant. Nor would the defendant's proof in support of his plea be of any avail unless it incontestably established that the occurrence could not have been avoided by the exercise of such care and diligence on his part. The logical aspect of the instruction is far beyond my comprehension. If the plaintiff's negligence contributed to the accident, and the defendant was also guilty of negligence in the affair, then it was necessarily the result of their joint wrong; and it certainly could have been avoided by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence on the part of the plaintiff. Why, then, should the defendant be liable to the plaintiff for its wrong, when the plaintiff's wrong was at least equally as instrumental in producing the result?

This will be the first case on record, I imagine, where contribution between wrongdoers has been enforced by a court of justice. If there had been evidence in the case tending to show that the conduct of the agents and servants of the appellant was reckless in the transaction which resulted in the destruction of the respondent's horse, or which indicated a total indifference and disregard of the respondent's rights of property, and such fact had been alleged in the complaint, or set forth in the reply, the trial court might very properly have instructed the jury that, if they found that such had been the conduct of the agents and servants of the appellant, they would be authorized to find him liable, although the plaintiff was guilty of negligence which contributed to the accident; but, in order to admit of a recovery in such a case, the conduct of the defendant must be proven to have been something more than negligent. It must be shown to have been willfully done; for upon no other ground can a plaintiff recover damages against a defendant for an injury resulting from the joint act of both parties. The law will not tolerate so illogical a sequence as the allowance of a recovery of damages by one party against another on account of a transaction in which they are in pari delicto. But to submit to a jury questions of fact where there is no evidence in the case which will warrant them in making a finding thereon, or to submit to them questions involving both law and fact in a confused mass, and then send them out to guess at a verdict, is a travesty upon justice.

I do not think the respondent was entitled to recover the judgment appealed from, nor see how it can legally be upheld. It is unjust in principle, and pernicious in its consequences, and was evidently obtained by sham and pretense. The idea that those in charge of the train of cars in question ran it against the horse purposely, or failed to do all in their power which could safely be done to avoid the collision, is too absurd and preposterous to be credited for a moment. The courts of this State cannot afford to tolerate a sentiment which ignores the rights of any parties litigant, whether belonging to natural or artificial persons. Because the appellant is a wealthy railroad corporation, and possibly arbitrary, extortionate and exacting in its dealings with the public, it does not follow that its rights should be ignored. Nor is it good policy on the part of the community to countenance or encourage such practice. We must deal honestly and fairly by railroad companies, whether they do so by us or not. Such a course will be found to be by far the best in the long run. We may succeed in compelling them to pay for a few horses and cattle belonging to thriftless owners, who would probably prefer to have them run over and killed, if they could get anywhere near their estimate of value of the animals, than to exert the slightest effort to prevent the occurrence; but the advantage will be very inconsiderable as compared to the injury which retaliatory measures, if resorted to on the part of the railroads, would occasion, and it would be very unwise to incite any such antagonism. Railroad companies should be required to do their full duty to the public, and, if it need legislation to enforce it, stringent measures should be adopted; but to allow a petty system of illegal and unjust plundering of them will prove to be an indiscreet and shortsighted policy.

lien in respect of goods sold upon a credit is not a right to rescind the contract of sale, but is a right to detain the goods until the indebtedness for the purchase price is discharged at or before the expiration of the credit, and, if not so discharged, to sell them and apply the proceeds of their sale to the liquidation of the indebtedness.

2. It is an additional security for the payment of the purchase price, and is not waived by the act of the vendor in resorting to any other security which he may have, provided such security is not in itself a security of such a nature as waives or discharges the lien.

3. A collection of facts stated, in which it appeared that several attachments were sued out by different creditors of a common debtor, apparently at the same time, all of them acting through the same attorney; that the different writs came into the hands of the sheriff within a few minutes of each other; that they were all levied on the following day, apparently at the same time; and that subsequently, on motions of the several plaintiffs, the suits were consolidated and proceeded to judgment together. It is held, that this evidence exhibited such a concert of action as authorized the trier of the facts to find that all the attaching creditors were joint actors, and that either of them was guilty of a conversion in case any of the levies should be adjudged tortious.

4. The delivery, as collateral security, of a bill of sale, copies of gaugers' returns and a warehouse receipt of whiskey held in the United States bonded warehouse, creates a pledge, and not a chattel mortgage.

5. Where, from its situation, personal property is not susceptible of actual delivery, manual delivery is not essential to the creation of a pledge; it may be created by a symbolical delivery,—as by the delivery of a bill of parcels and a warehouse receipt.

6. The English doctrine which, in the case of a pledge by a symbolical delivery, requires an attornment by the warehouseman or other custodian of the goods, in order to create such a delivery as will support the pledge, is not in force in this country.

7. The owner of goods stored in his own warehouse cannot make a valid pledge of them, by issuing to another an instrument in the form of a warehouse receipt, in which he professes to hold the goods for that other. Such an attempt to create a pledge is void, as being contrary to the provisions of our Statute relating to chattel mortgages, which requires a delivery of possession or a recording in the office of the recorder of deeds. (Rev. Stat. 1879, § 2002.)

8. The law of a sister State of the American Union is a foreign law in the sense that it is not judicially noticed in the tribunals of this State, but must, in order to have effect here, be proved as a fact.

9. The burden of proving the law of another State rests upon the party claiming rights under it, and, in the absence of such proof, the trial court is authorized to presume that the same rule of law which obtains in this State obtains in that State, it being founded in the principles of the common law, and not the necessary outgrowth of a local and peculiar statute.

10. Where a contract is in writing and is so distinctly drawn as to leave no ambiguity for parol explanation, evidence of a prior course of dealing between the parties to it, and especially of a prior course of dealing between one of the parties to it and the predecessor of the other party, cannot be appealed to to supply an interpretation of it.

11. But it is competent to show that the parties in their dealings under the contract varied its terms by a subsequent parol agreement.

12. Where the facts are numerous and equivocal—susceptible of different inferences in respect of the question, What was the real intent of the parties?—the question whether there has been such a delivery as devests the vendor's lien, is a question of fact for a jury.

13. In such a case, in an action at law, the inferences of fact made by the trial court are not reviewable on appeal, provided they are fairly within the scope of the evidence.

14. The leading incidents of a vendor's lien are: that it presupposes title in the vendee; that it is not a right of retention, but of detention; that it arises by implication of law while the goods remain in the possession of the vendor and the purchase price is unpaid; that it is waived by stipulations in the contract of sale inconsistent with its exercise, as by giving time for payment and taking a negotiable security therefor; that this waiver takes place on the implied condition that the vendee will keep his credit good during the term of the credit; that it revives if, during such term, the vendee becomes insolvent, and that the insolvency which revives it is insolvency in the mercantile sense—an inability to pay one's debts as fast as they mature.

15. It is not a universal rule that the delivery of the goods which devests the vendor of his lien must be such a delivery, actual or constructive, as would amount to an "actual receipt" of the goods within the meaning of the seventeenth section of the English Statute of Frauds; nor is it a safe test in determining whether this lien has been devested to consider whether there has been such a delivery.

16. As between the vendor and vendee, and in cases where the rights of subsequent purchasers of the vendee are not concerned, this lien is not devested by any species of constructive delivery, so long as the vendor retains the actual custody of the goods, either by himself or by his agent or servant.

17. This lien is not destroyed by involving the goods to the purchaser.

18. Nor is it destroyed by marking the packages with the purchaser's name. So held, where the goods consisted of barrels of whiskey distilled in a distillery which, by an arrangement between the contracting parties, mentioned by the agents of the government, was run in the name of the vendee, and the barrels furnished by the vendor were branded with the name of the vendee as distiller and placed in the distillery warehouse.

19. Nor is this lien destroyed by an agreement between the vendor and vendee that the goods shall remain in the warehouse of the vendor subject to the payment of storage by the vendee. The doctrine of Barratt v. Goddard, 3 Mason, 107, on this subject denied, and the decision criticized.

20. The fact that by the agreement between the vendor and vendee something remains to be done to the goods by the vendor, is not conclusive that there has not been such a delivery as cuts off the vendor's lien, but creates a prima facie presumption to that effect, which may be rebutted by circumstances. If the thing remaining to be done was intended to prepare the goods for delivery, the lien continues, but if the facts essential to a delivery have taken place, and the thing remaining to be done is merely in the nature of a subsequent service by the vendor with reference to the goods, the lien is discharged. When, therefore, the goods at the time the contract of sale is made, though in the legal custody and control, are not in the actual possession, of the vendee, but are so situated that he cannot obtain actual possession until a specific act is done by the vendor, if the vendee becomes insolvent before this act has been done, and the actual possession of the goods has not been changed, the vendor may detain the goods as security for the payment of the contract price.

21. The lien of the unpaid vendor for distilled spirits is not destroyed by placing them in a government warehouse in charge of a government storekeeper. The custody of the government storekeeper is intended merely to secure the government in its revenue, and not to interrupt or impair the rights of any vendor, vendee or pledgee, beyond what the terms of the statute under which he holds possession absolutely require.

22. Where the contract stipulated for the doing of three things by the vendor before the delivery should be complete: (1) to give care and attention to the packages while in the government warehouse, the same being the distillery warehouse of the vendor; (2) to place insurance upon the property, if so required by the vendee; (3) and, finally, to complete the delivery of the property itself by placing it free of charge on board the cars.—It was held, that, presumptively, there had been no actual delivery until the last of these three things had been performed, unless the other circumstances surrounding the transaction were such as to repel the presumption, and whether they were was a question of fact.

23. In the provisions of the Revenue Laws of the United States, which require the delivery of distilled spirits by the government warehouseman to the owner when the tax is paid. Congress merely intended, by the use of a general word of description, to designate, without circumlocution or needless specification, any person who, upon the payment of the government dues, is in law entitled to the possession of the goods.

24. The lien of an unpaid vendor of goods is not self-executing. It is a right which he may or may not assert, and which if not asserted in time, is lost. If, therefore, the vendor, retaining the goods under a contract with the vendee, in the vendor's distillery warehouse, allows the vendee to call the warehouse his own for the purposes of his trade, and to issue warehouse receipts in respect of the goods, the license thus given to the vendee to issue warehouse receipts does not, ipse facto, expire upon the happening of the vendee's insolvency.

25. Where goods which have been sold on credit remain in the possession of the vendor under such circumstances that his lien will revive upon the happening of the insolvency of the vendee, a pledge of the goods by the vendor to his creditor, as collateral security for an antecedent indebtedness, the creditor parting with no new value and making no agreement for delay, does not constitute the pledgee a purchaser for value, in such a sense as gives him a better right in respect of the goods than his pledgor and cuts off the lien of the unpaid vendor.

26. In such a case the pledgee of the vendee cannot be regarded as having a better right than the vendee, on the principle of estoppel, unless he shows that what has been said or done by the vendee has in some way influenced the conduct of the pledgee to his detriment. The law will not presume, in the absence of evidence, that such was the fact.

27. Where the rights of the parties depended upon the law of Kentucky, and this circumstance was not brought to the attention of the trial court by either party, and such law was not proved as a fact, the court declined to affirm the judgment as being for the right party, on the theory that the pledge under which the plaintiffs claimed was not by the law of Missouri a valid pledge, when the court knew, as a matter of general learning, that it was a valid pledge under the law of Kentucky. On the other hand, the court declined to reverse a judgment for the defendants which rested on the ground that the title of the plaintiff was that of a pledgee of warehouse receipts as collateral security for an antecedent debt,—the law of Missouri on the subject being unsettled, and the law of Kentucky, by which the rights of the parties were governed, which had not been put in evidence in the trial court, being, on the analogous subject of commercial paper, that a pledgee for an antecedent debt is not a taker for value, but holds subject to prior equities.

APPEALS by plaintiffs from judgments of the Circuit Court for St. Louis City in favor of defendants in actions brought to recover damages for the alleged conversion of certain whiskey. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. David Goldsmith for appellants.

Mr. Silas B. Jones for respondents.

Thompson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case has been argued three times at very great length and with much ability on both sides,—the last time before the two judges who alone participate in this decision. Two other actions, Julius Conrad, Administrator of Helena Paulsen, Appellant, v. John J. Fisher et al., Respondents, No. 8711, and Henry Schloster, Appellant, v. John J. Fisher et al., Respondents, No. 8712,—have also been argued and submitted together with this case. The three actions are of the same nature, arising out of the same transaction and depending upon the same principles of law. They were tried together before the same judge sitting as a jury, and judgments in all of them were entered for the defendants. They are presented in this court for review upon a single bill of exceptions, by a stipulation of the parties. This opinion will dispose of the other two cases, as well as of this case.

Each of these three cases is an action for the conversion of certain whiskey at Silver Creek, in Richmond County, Kentucky. The facts, so far as it seems necessary to state them at the outset, were as follows: During the time when the rights in controversy arose, Charles W. Conrad was doing business in St. Louis, Missouri, under the name and style of C. Conrad & Co. The defendants were partners in two different firms (Gregory, Stagg & Co. and W. S. Hume & Co.) engaged in the business of distillers and rectifiers at Silver Creek, Kentucky. A third firm, Stagg, Hume & Co., and also the two firms above named, of which they were successors, had had a course of dealing with C. Conrad & Co., similar to that which took place under the contract hereafter set out upon which the rights now to be disposed of depend. There is a great amount of testimony in the record as to the nature of this course of dealing, and the facts adduced by this testimony are set out at considerable length by the appellants in their statement, of which we shall speak hereafter.

As introductory to the contract itself, it may be stated that Conrad, doing business at St. Louis under the name of C. Conrad & Co., had acquired an extensive reputation for a certain kind of beer, which had been brewed and bottled for him in St. Louis, and which he had sold under the name of Budweiser beer. He desired to found a similar reputation in respect of certain kinds of whiskey, but as he was not a distiller, it was necessary to find a distiller who would make for him whiskey of the desired grade, and who would assist him in holding himself out to the world as the distiller of it. The defendants were willing to make such whiskey for him and to assist him in representing himself to the public as the distiller of it. In order to carry out this purpose, the following contract was entered into:

"This agreement, made and entered into this 25th day of October, 1882, between Stagg, Hume & Co., of St. Louis, Missouri, of the first part, and C. Conrad & Co., of St. Louis, Missouri, of the second part, witnesseth:

"That the party of the first part agrees to make for the party of the second part, during the months of November and December, 1882, and January, 1883, at the Silver Creek distillery in Madison County, Kentucky, 2,100 barrels of Mom-Rose Sour Mash Bourbon whiskey and 400 barrels Governor's Choice Rye whiskey, at 46½ cents per proof gallon for the Bourbon and 62½ cents per proof gallon for the Rye—the Bourbon to be invoiced when all made, and the Rye to be invoiced when all made, as per return of United States gauger on duty at distillery.

"That during the manufacture of the whiskey herein contracted for the firm name of the party of the second part (Conrad & Co.) shall be used as distillers, provided that the said party of the second part shall not in any way be held responsible or liable to the United States government for the conduct of the distillery.

"That settlement for the whiskey shall be made as follows. The party of the second part shall give their notes or acceptances, each for $800, payable, the first note on June 10, 1883, and a note payable on the Saturday of each week following until all are paid. That the whiskey shall be of the standard quality of the "Hume" brand, the cooperage first class, eight-iron hooped barrels, well charred, branded with the firm name of the party of the second part as distillers—all brands required to be furnished by the party of the first part—the packages to contain from forty-six to fifty gallons each, and the proof of the whiskey to run as nearly uniform at 101 per cent as it is possible to make it.

"That storage shall be charged at the rate of five cents per barrel per month from date of entry into United States Warehouse No. 541, Eighth District of Kentucky, and that all care and attention shall be given the packages while in store by the party of the first part.

"That upon the release from bond and payment of United States and state taxes and storage by the party of the second part, packages shall be delivered free of charge by the party of the first part, on board of the cars at Silver Creek, Kentucky.

"That the party of the first part, if desired to do so by the party of the second part, shall place insurance, loss, if any, payable to the party of the second part, who shall pay the premium at not to exceed current rates.

"That if, from fire or other casualty, the party of the first part shall be unable to comply with the terms of this contract in full or in part, the said party of the first part shall not in any way be held liable for such nonfulfillment of contract.

"That when the whiskey is all invoiced and the notes are given for the amount, the party of the first part agrees to pay to the party of the second part $250, in consideration of which the party of the second part agrees to give the party of the first part two cases containing twelve quart bottles of the best French champagne and two casks of Budweiser beer.

"Witness our hands this 25th day of October, 1882, at St. Louis, Mo.

"Stagg, Hume & Co.,
"C. Conrad & Co."

The whiskey in controversy was made (or caused to be made, in the manner hereafter stated), by Stagg, Hume & Co., under this contract, and was placed in United States Bonded Warehouse No. 541, as therein provided for. On the 9th of February, 1883, Conrad, being in failing circumstances, and being indebted to these plaintiffs in various amounts which had long been due, delivered to each one of them, without their solicitation, a warehouse receipt for a quantity of this whiskey as collateral security for the indebtedness owing to them, they asking him no questions and he making to them no statements at the time as to why he did this. On the 10th of the same month he suspended payment and his insolvency became known and published; and on the 26th he made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors. Meantime the plaintiffs had taken no steps to withdraw the whiskey from the government warehouse, but merely held the warehouse receipts, parting with no new value for them. The notes given by Conrad to Stagg, Hume & Co. for the whiskey were in their possession, not negotiable, and unpaid at the time of his suspension. Conrad was insolvent to the extent that, although much of his indebtedness was secured, his unsecured creditors received from the administrator of the unpledged assets of his estate no more than ten cents on the dollar.

Soon after his suspension, Stagg, Hume & Co. sued out an attachment in Richmond County, Kentucky, to enforce a vendor's lien upon the whiskey. The other two partnership firms already named (Gregory, Stagg & Co. and W. S. Hume & Co.), of which two firms the defendants were members, being creditors of Conrad on other accounts, sued out other attachments. These attachment suits were, by agreement of the various attaching creditors, consolidated, and, in the consolidation suit, judgment was rendered for the plaintiffs, fixing their respective priorities. The property was sold thereunder; and, although Stagg, Hume & Co. proved up their claim as holders of the notes given by Conrad for the purchase price of the whiskey before the assignee of his estate, and received a dividend in common with the other creditors, yet the total amount which was realized from the sale of the whiskey in Kentucky, in the various attachment suits, added to the dividend thus received by them, was not sufficient to liquidate the indebtedness evidenced by the notes given by Conrad to them for the purchase price of the whiskey.

We understand it to be the settled law that the right to enforce a vendor's lien in respect of goods sold upon a credit is not a right to rescind the contract of sale, but is a right to detain the goods until the indebtedness for the purchase price is discharged, at or before the expiration of the credit, and, if not so discharged, to sell them and apply the proceeds of their sale to the liquidation of the indebtedness. Dabcock v. Bonnell, 80 N. Y. 244, Chandler v. Fulton, 10 Tex. 2, 60 Am. Dec. 188, 199, Newhall v. Central Pac. R. Co. 51 Cal. 245, 21 Am. Rep. 712.

It is an additional security, and is not waived by the act of the vendor in resorting to any other security which he may have, provided such security is not in itself a security of such a nature as waives or discharges the lien. Hence, there was nothing incompatible in the act of Stagg, Hume & Co. in proving up their claim before the assignee of Conrad, and receiving a dividend from his estate in its administration, under the Assignment Law of Missouri, in common with other creditors, and in their also proceeding by such means as the law of Kentucky left available to them to enforce their vendor's lien upon the whiskey in the bonded warehouse at Silver Creek in that State, nor is such a contention made on behalf of the plaintiffs. Moreover, as they did not realize enough from both sources—that is, from the dividends received from Conrad's assignee and from the proceeds of the sale of the whiskey under their attachment in Kentucky—to satisfy the notes given for the purchase money, it must follow that, if they had a vendor's lien which they were entitled to enforce against the whiskey, the existence of such a lien is a complete defense to these actions for conversion, provided the title of the plaintiffs is not better than that of Conrad, their transferrer. The strength of this conclusion has been seen by the learned counsel for the plaintiffs, and therefore his chief effort has been to convince the court that Stagg, Hume & Co. had no vendor's lien upon the whiskey in controversy.

Before proceeding to the consideration of the question, it is necessary to get out of the way two other objections raised by the defendant, because, assuming that these objections properly arise upon the record, if they are well taken, they require an affirmance of the judgment, which was given for the defendant, irrespective of the question whether or not Stagg, Hume & Co. had a vendor's lien upon the whiskey.

I. The first of these objections is that there is no evidence in the record tending to show a conversion. In order to understand the grounds upon which this objection is placed, it is necessary to recall the facts that the whiskey was seized under four attachments, simultaneously levied upon it at Silver Creek, Kentucky, by three different firms; that these firms were composed in the aggregate of numerous parties, and that the two defendants who alone are sued in these actions (process having been returned as to the others "not found"), are James A. Gregory and John J. Fisher, neither of whom was a member of the firm of Stagg, Hume & Co., the makers (through the Silver Creek Distilling Company) of the whiskey under the contract with Conrad above set out. These three partnership firms were Stagg, Hume & Co., composed of Stagg, of Hume, and of Taylor, Jr.; W. S. Hume & Co., composed of Fisher, Gregory, Stagg, Hume and Embury; and Gregory, Stagg & Co., composed of Gregory, Stagg, Fisher and

Hume. The defendants Fisher and Gregory were members of the firm of W. S. Hume & Co., and also of the firm of Gregory, Stagg & Co. On January 23, 1883, four suits were instituted by these various firms against Charles W. Conrad, in the court of Common Pleas in Madison County, Kentucky, two of them known as No. 1 and No. 2, by Stagg, Hume & Co., the makers of the whiskey and the parties of the first part in the contract above set out, one of them by W. S. Hume & Co., and one by Gregory, Stagg & Co. In all these suits attachments were sued out against the property of Conrad. In the suit of Stagg, Hume & Co., known as No. 1, the effort was to enforce a vendor's lien upon the whiskey in controversy. The writ of attachment issued in this suit came into the hands of the sheriff of Madison County, Kentucky, at three minutes past ten o'clock in the evening of the same day; the writ in the action of W. S. Hume & Co. came into his hands at ten minutes past ten o'clock in the evening of the same day; and the writ in the action of Gregory, Stagg & Co. came into his hands at twelve minutes past ten o'clock in the evening of the same day. The three writs were all levied, on the next day, on the whiskey in controversy, by a notice to the person in charge of the warehouse where it was stored. Possession of the whiskey was never taken nor disturbed under any of the writs. The cases were managed for the several plaintiffs by the same attorneys. They were consolidated for trial, and judgment was given, settling out the rights of each of the plaintiffs, there being other whiskey involved besides that in controversy here, and adjudging a prior right and lien in favor of Stagg, Hume & Co. to the whiskey in controversy, which was sold to satisfy their lien, but which, as already stated, did not bring enough to satisfy it. Neither W. S. Hume & Co., nor Gregory, Stagg & Co., got any part of the proceeds of the sale of the whiskey in controversy. No effort was made in the court below to show that in point of fact the attachment of W. S. Hume & Co. or that of Gregory, Stagg & Co., in any way interfered with the rights of these plaintiffs. But the plaintiffs rested upon the position that what was done under the attachments was per se a conversion of the whiskey in controversy, and the defendants now insist that such is not the law. The circuit court adjudged this point against the defendants, and we are unable to say that its conclusion was wrong. It is clear in our minds that there was here evidence tending to show such a concert of action among the four attaching creditors as placed all of them in the position, if the attachments were wrongful, of co-trespassers or joint tortfeasors, within the meaning of the rule laid down by this court at the present term in the case of Leaver v. Rock/iff, 83 Mo. App. 223, and the cases there cited; and the sufficiency of this evidence was a question of fact for the trial court, sitting as a jury. It is perceived that the attachments were sued out apparently at the same time, by the parties acting through the same attorney; that the different writs came into the hands of the sheriff within a few minutes of each other; that they were all levied on the following day, apparently at the same time, for the hours of the several levies are not specified in the sheriff's return; and that subsequently, on motions of the several plaintiffs, the suits were consolidated and proceeded to judgment together. The fact that the attachment which first came into the hands of the sheriff may, by operation of law, have taken precedence in the first distribution of the fund does not, we think, at all negative the conclusion that there was such concert of action as made all the parties liable as co-trespassers, in case the levies should be adjudged tortious. The levies, it may be assumed, took effect by relation as of the respective dates when the different writs came into the hands of the sheriff. But this doctrine of relation is to be regarded as a fiction resorted to for the purpose of determining the priorities of the attaching creditors as among themselves, and not for the purpose of determining the liability of any one of them as between himself and the defendant in the attachment suit.

11. The next position of the respondent is that the delivery of the bill of sale, copies of gaugers' returns and so-called warehouse receipts created a mere pledge, which was invalid, because there was no delivery. It is not disputed that these papers were delivered to the plaintiffs as collateral security, and not in payment. The transaction, therefore, constituted a pledge or mortgage. That it constituted a pledge, and not a mortgage, can scarcely be the subject of doubt. A bill of sale of chattels, absolute on its face, may, indeed, be shown by parol evidence to have been intended as a mere security for a debt. Nesell v. Kaefer, 18 Mo. App. 189. Such was the undisputed evidence here, and whether it was a mortgage or a pledge was a question of law. If it were a mortgage and not recorded, it would not be good against creditors of the mortgagor, unless accompanied by delivery. In that respect it would stand on the same footing as a pledge, for delivery is essential to the validity of a pledge. These warehouse receipts were evidently intended to make a symbolical delivery to the plaintiffs, as security for their respective debts. This would make a pledge, provided a pledge can be created by such an instrument, and by no other delivery, actual or constructive. This is shown by the following case: Parshall v. Eggert, 32 Barb. 367, affirmed on this point though reversed on another, 54 N. Y. 18. This view is also confirmed by numerous holdings to the effect that taking a bill of sale or bill of parcels of personal property, absolute in its terms, as collateral security merely, amounts only to a pledge. Walker v. Staples, 5 Allen, 84; Thompson v. Delsner, 133 Mass. 108; Kimball v. Hildreth, 5 Allen, 107; Morgan v. Dod, 3 Colo. 551.

But it does not follow that a valid pledge can be created only by manual delivery of the property pledged. Where, from its situation, the property is not susceptible of actual delivery, a valid pledge may be created by symbolical delivery. Ex parte Pitt, 3 Lowell, 519; Jones, Pledge, § 36.

Thus, property in transit may undoubtedly be pledged by the deposit of a bill of lading. Myers v. Barber, L. R. 3 C. P. 30, affirmed, Id. 561, and in L. R. 4 H. L. 317.

We have held in this court that goods in a warehouse may be pledged by delivery of the warehouse receipt, even without its being indorsed by the pledgor. St. Louis Nat. Bank v. Ross, 9 Mo. App. 309.

That goods in the hands of a warehouseman may be pledged by a transfer of the warehouse receipt was again held by this court in Fourth Nat. Bank v. St. Louis Cotton Compress Co., 11 Mo. App. 341, and has been held by other courts in numerous cases. Jones, Pledge, §§ 280, 298, 303, and cases cited.

That goods detained in the custom house to secure the payment of duties may be pledged by a written contract noted on the books of the chief officer of the custom house without actual delivery, was held by the English Privy Council, reversing the Canadian Court of Queen's Bench, in Toussaint v. Lambert, L. R. 3 P. C. 143.

This last case, however, involves an idea which seems to be fundamental in the English law, namely, that where goods are in the possession of a third party, in order to constitute such a constructive delivery as will support a valid pledge, there must be an attornment by the actual custodian. Sir Joseph Napier, in giving the judgment of the court in the case just cited said: "It appears to their lordships that, by the express agreement of the parties in this case, followed by the acceptance of the chief warehouse keeper, there was a valid constructive delivery of the property comprised in the contract." Id. 156.

But our law does not seem to require an attornment in order to complete a symbolical delivery. Davis v. Russell, 52 Cal. 611.

The decisions in this State do not give countenance to such an idea, although in Massachusetts they have followed the English rule. Hallgarten v. Oldham, 135 Mass. 1.

But Mr. Jones in his very satisfactory work on Pledges, speaks of this decision as "contrary to the general rule." Jones, Pledge, § 300.

We should therefore have no difficulty in overruling the contention of the respondents upon this point, if we could regard these instruments as warehouse receipts.

But it has been held by this court, and by several other courts, that a receipt issued by the owner of goods stored in his own store is not a warehouse receipt at all. Valley Nat. Bank v. Frank, 12 Mo. App. 460; Thorne v. First Nat. Bank, 37 Ohio St. 254; Adams v. Merchants Nat. Bank, 2 Fed. Rep. 174, 9 Blin. 396; Tennant v. McNamara, 45 N. Y. 614; Formers Bank v. Lang, 87 N. Y. 300.

In Valley Nat. Bank v. Frank, supra, this court held that the issue by a merchant of a receipt for goods held in his own store, in the form of a warehouse receipt, had not the effect in law of a transfer of title by means of a warehouse receipt, as against a subsequent innocent purchaser.

In Thorne v. First Nat. Bank, supra, it was held that an instrument substantially like a warehouse receipt, issued by a debtor to his creditor, on property owned by the debtor, who was not a warehouseman, for the sole purpose of securing such creditor, was void as against other creditors, where the property remained in the possession of the debtor. In the view which the court took, it was void as an attempt to create a lien upon personal property contrary to the provisions of the Statute making chattel mortgages void unless accompanied by delivery of possession, or unless the mortgage be recorded—which Statute is substantially similar to ours. Rev. Stat. § 2508.

In Adams v. Merchants Nat. Bank, supra, a similar ruling was made upon a similar state of facts and based upon similar reasons—the court holding that, in order to create a valid pledge by the transfer of a warehouse receipt, the receipt must be issued and transferred in compliance with the governing statute, otherwise, it will be regarded as in the nature of a mortgage, and void because not recorded or accompanied by the delivery of the property.

A similar ruling was made, and upon similar grounds, in Yeani v. McNames, supra. This last case is also authority for the position that such an attempted pledge is not good under our statute relating to warehouse receipts. That Statute recites: "All receipts issued or given by any warehouseman or other person or firm . . . are hereby made negotiable," etc. Rev. Stat. § 558.

The New York Statute contained the same recitals, using the words "or other persons."

Yet it was held that a receipt issued by the owner of the goods, who held them in his own storehouse, was not a warehouse receipt; that the issuing of it to a creditor did not create a valid pledge, for want of transfer; but that it was an attempt to create a mortgage contrary to the provisions of the Statute (similar to ours), requiring mortgages of chattels to be accompanied by delivery or else recorded.

In another case in the same State, a commission merchant procured a discount of his promissory note upon the following receipt as collateral: "Received in store, for account of Messrs. P. & S, subject to their order, the following named property, as security to pay note given this day" (describing the note and also the property thus attempted to be pledged). There was no manual delivery of the property, and no other symbolical delivery than was effected by the issuing of this receipt, but the property remained in the storehouse of the commission merchant as before. It was held: (1) That the receipt was not a chattel mortgage, and that, if it were, it was void as against the creditors of the mortgagor, because there was neither a delivery nor a recordation as required by the Statute. (2) That the transaction did not, in legal effect, constitute a pledge, because it lacked the essential of delivery. (3) That the fact that the property was delivered to the attempted pledgee, before it was levied upon by the attachment under which the defendant justified, did not validate this pledge. Parshall v. Eppart, 53 Barb. 387. On appeal from this ruling, the court of appeals of the same State held that the transaction was a pledge, and that, considered as a pledge, it was validated by the subsequent delivery before the rights of the attaching creditors supervened—leaving the ruling undisturbed on the other points. See S. C. 54 N. Y. 18.

A similar ruling was made under the provisions of the Civil Code of Louisiana (arts. 3125, 3129), where certain attempted pledgees, having allowed the pledgor to remain in possession of the goods which he had attempted to pledge to them, by issuing to them papers by which he professed to have received the goods from them on storage, were held not entitled to the rights of pledgees against subsequent purchasers. Gadde v. Bennett, 6 La. Ann. 516.

A ruling of Mr. District Judge Lowell in a case in bankruptcy is to the general effect that there might be, under circumstances, a valid pledge of cumbersome material, such as locomotive engines, by the delivery of bills of sale, although the property should remain in the possession of the pledgor. Its parts Fits, 3 Lowell, 519.

But no allusion is made in that case to the existence or effect of any local statute requiring chattel mortgages to be recorded or to be accompanied by delivery, and I do not therefore regard that decision as authority in such a case as that before us. Besides, it does not seem to me to have been well decided upon its circumstances. It invests a bill of sale with the qualities which the Mercantile Law, for purposes of commerce, attaches to bills of lading and to warehouse receipts, and I do not find any well-considered case that has gone to that extent.

But we find that it has been held in Kentucky, construing the Statute of that State (Kentucky Act March 6, 1869), that a person having goods stored in his own warehouse may transfer title in them by issuing warehouse receipts (Newcombe v. Cabell, 10 Bush, 460), and may, by issuing such a receipt, make a valid pledge to them to another,—placing such warehouse receipts on the same footing as similar receipts given by a warehouseman to the owner of the goods and by him transferred in pledge. Cochran v. Ripsey, 13 Bush, 495, Ferguson v. Northern Bank of Kentucky, 14 Bush, 555. See also Farmer v. Gregory, 18 Ky. 475, Greenbaum v. Meyboden, 10 Bush, 419.

If the rights of the plaintiffs under these so-called warehouse receipts are governed by the Law of Kentucky, then it is to be observed that the Law of Kentucky is a foreign law which is not judicially noticed in the tribunals of this State, but which must, in order to have effect here, be proved as a fact (Belking v. Hebel, 1 Mo. App. 340; Flato v. Mulhall, 73 Mo. 522; Meyer v. McCabe, 73 Mo. 236, Burgner v. Chicago R. Co. 13 Mo. App. 499); that the burden of proving what the law of Kentucky was upon this point was upon the plaintiffs; and that, in the absence of such proof, the circuit court was authorized to presume that the same rule of law which obtains in this State obtains in Kentucky, it being founded in the principles of the common law, and not the necessary outgrowth of a local and peculiar statute. Meyer v. McCabe and Burgner v. Chicago R. Co. supra.

It is also true that the Supreme Court of Michigan has held (approving the ruling in the Kentucky case of Cochran v. Ripsey, supra) that a warehouseman having property of his own in store may, by issuing a warehouse receipt, make a valid pledge of it to secure his own indebtedness. Detroit M. & M. Bank v. Hubbard, 48 Mich. 118.

But, as the case stands, we should be bound to hold, following our own decision in Valley Nat. Bank v. Frank, supra, and believing that attempted pledges in this form, by a person of his own property in his own warehouse, are in contravention of the letter and policy of the Statute already referred to relating to chattel mortgages—that these warehouse receipts were neither valid as pledges nor as mortgages, and consequently that the plaintiffs have exhibited no title and no standing in court—were it not for the fact that it nowhere appears that this view of the rights of the parties was brought to the attention of the court below during the trial. If it had been, the plaintiffs could have obviated it by putting in evidence the report of the Kentucky case of Cochran v. Ripley, supra, thereby proving that the law of Kentucky on this subject is different from our own law. In this peculiar state of the record, we do not feel authorized to affirm the judgment on this point, as being for the right party, since we know as a fact that under the law of Kentucky, by which this contract of pledge is to be governed, it was a valid pledge.

III. This brings us to the main question which has been contested, namely, whether there was such a delivery of the property as defeated the vendor's lien. In order to a proper understanding of this question, it will be necessary to state at considerable length the manner in which the parties executed the contract above set out. This statement would be less difficult, were it not for the various aliases under which the parties did business. The party of the first part was, as already stated, a partnership existing at Silver Creek, Kentucky, called Stagg, Hume & Co., but they executed their contract through a corporation organized under the laws of Kentucky, called the Silver Creek Distilling Company, which corporation was the owner of a distillery at Silver Creek, Kentucky, and also the owner of the government warehouse, number 541, into which, by the terms of the contract, the whiskey was to be and was in fact placed. It is perceived, by reference to this peculiar contract, that Conrad desired to be held out to the world as the distiller of this whiskey, and that Stagg, Hume & Co. were willing to assist him in holding himself out as such distiller. For this purpose, it was absolutely necessary, under the Acts of Congress relating to internal revenue, that the distillery should be run in the name of the assumed distiller, to wit, in the name of C. Conrad & Co., and that the warehouse, which is an integral part of the distillery under such statutes, should be treated as his warehouse. For it must be borne in mind that, by the terms of those laws, each distillery has a warehouse, and that the spirits, as soon as distilled, must be at once conveyed to a receiving cistern (U. S. Rev. Stat. § 8267), whence they must, within three days, be drawn into casks, which casks must be directly removed to the distillery warehouse. As soon as the whiskey is thus removed to the distillery warehouse, each cask must be stamped with what is termed the distillery warehouse stamp, which stamp must contain, among other things, the name of the distiller and the serial number of the cask. With these provisions of the law in force, it would have been obviously impracticable for Conrad to attempt to hold himself out to the public as the distiller of whiskey distilled by someone else, unless he could in some way contrive to have his own name stamped upon the barrels by the officer of the government under the provisions of this law.

It therefore became necessary, in order to maintain before the public the simulation of C. Conrad & Co. being the distillers, that the government should in some sense recognize the fact that the distillery was the distillery of C. Conrad & Co., and the further fact that the warehouse was the warehouse of C. Conrad & Co. Accordingly, the Silver Creek Distilling Company, by whose agency Stagg, Hume & Co. executed the contract, gave the statutory notice to the collector that they proposed to manufacture a certain quantity of whiskey in their distillery at Silver Creek, Kentucky, "doing business as C. Conrad & Co.;" that is to say, for a purpose of their own, the Silver Creek Distilling Company proposed, while manufacturing this whiskey at this distillery, to change their names and take the name of C. Conrad & Co., and the officers of the government, rightly or wrongly, were willing that they should do this.

Touching this matter, the plaintiffs have argued that, under the Federal Statutes, the firm name of C. Conrad & Co. could not be legally used as distillers, nor could the whiskey be lawfully branded with the name of that firm as distillers, nor could any other name be lawfully entered upon the stamps of that of the distiller without actually running the distillery for them and altogether in their name—by which we understand them to mean that, whereas the distillery could not thus be lawfully run in the name of C. Conrad & Co. without their being the distillers, therefore they must have been the distillers. But we confess we cannot understand the force of this reasoning. It seems to us that this is equivalent to saying that whereas a man cannot lawfully do wrong in a given particular, yet if he had done wrong in that particular, therefore he has done right. Whether the distillery could lawfully be run in the peculiar manner in which this distillery was run, is a question between those who so ran it and the government of the United States, with which question we are not concerned. We allude to this merely because it is a branch of a similar line of argument upon which much contention of the plaintiffs rests; and it is just to their learned counsel to say that he seems finally to have abandoned it.

In order to carry out the peculiar provision of this contract by which C. Conrad & Co. should be held out as the distillers of this whiskey, without being in fact the distillers, it was of course necessary to keep up the simulation, in the face of the revenue officers, of C. Conrad & Co. being the distillers. With this end obviously in view, and with no other end in view, as the trial court was at liberty to find,—for any other end in view would contradict the contract and hence be absurd,—the firm name of C. Conrad & Co. was put above the door of the warehouse, and it frequently happened that, when correspondence took place between C. Conrad & Co. at St. Louis and the parties of the first part in this contract at Silver Creek, the letters were addressed by C. Conrad & Co. at St. Louis to C. Conrad & Co. at Silver Creek; and the replies to such letters, generally written by Mr. Embury, the secretary of the Silver Creek Distilling Company, were in like manner signed C. Conrad & Co., though sometimes such letters were addressed to Mr. Embury in his own name and replied to by him in his own name. The parties of the first part to this contract, under the contract the distillers of this whiskey, the vendors acting through the Silver Creek Distilling Company as their agents, or they being the agents of the Silver Creek Distilling Company, it matters little which,—for in either case there was a substantial identity between the parties,—were willing to call themselves C. Conrad & Co. and to be so called themselves. In these letters C. Conrad & Co., writing from St. Louis, would sometimes speak of the warehouse as our warehouse, and whoever would reply to the letters from Silver Creek would speak of the warehouse as your warehouse.

As has already been stated, the record contains much evidence of a course of dealing in reference to the manufacture of whiskey for Conrad, between him and the two firms which were predecessors in business at Silver Creek, Kentucky, of the firm of Stagg, Hume & Co., the party of the first part to the contract now under consideration, by which the whiskey now in controversy was made. This course of dealing took place under contracts similar in their terms to the present contract, and was a similar course of dealing to that which took place under the present contract. We mention this fact because great stress has been laid upon it in the able argument which has been made at the bar and submitted to us in print by the counsel for the plaintiffs. We do not perceive what peculiar bearing it has on the questions which we are to consider. It could at most be relevant as bearing upon the inferences of fact which the judge of the trial court, sitting as a jury, might be authorized to draw. But it is to be observed in this connection that the rights of the parties are to be governed by the written contract which they have made, and that a prior course of dealing, especially between one of the parties and other parties, cannot, on any principle with which we are acquainted, be appealed to as affording an interpretation of this contract—and more especially so as this contract is drawn in such distinct terms as to leave no ambiguities for parol explanation. Evidence of a course of dealing under this contract between the parties to it stands on a different footing, since it is competent for the parties to a contract to vary its terms by a subsequent course of dealing.

There is evidence tending to show that its terms were varied, or at least supplemented, in one important particular. It nowhere confers upon C. Conrad & Co. the power to issue warehouse receipts in respect to the whiskey while remaining in the bonded warehouse at Silver Creek. And yet the evidence shows that he did issue such warehouse receipts, that some of them were returned to Silver Creek, and that deliveries of whiskey were made upon them. The evidence in regard to his authority to issue these warehouse receipts is contradictory. The evidence in behalf of the plaintiffs tends to show that Conrad had acquired general authority from Stagg, Hume & Co. to issue warehouse receipts for whiskey in the warehouse at Silver Creek; the evidence of the defendants, on the other hand, tends to show that this authority was limited by the provision that the warehouse receipts should be returned to Silver Creek to be there registered—in other words, that Stagg, Hume & Co., or the Silver Creek Distilling Company, at Silver Creek, should have some sort of control over the matter. Conrad reported the issue of some of these warehouse receipts, by letters addressed to Embury, in "care of C. Conrad & Co.," at Silver Creek, and received replies thereto, signed by Embury, who was at the time the secretary of the Silver Creek Distilling Company.

The whiskey in controversy, when made, was deposited in the bonded warehouse number 541, at Silver Creek, in the name of C. Conrad & Co., in pursuance of the Internal Revenue Statutes, the entry in the warehouse being made by the corporation as "The Silver Creek Distilling Company, doing business as C. Conrad & Co." The warehouse bonds were in like manner given by "The Silver Creek Distilling Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Kentucky, doing business as C. Conrad & Co." These bonds were conditioned for the payment of taxes to the federal government. The whiskey was afterwards invoiced to C. Conrad & Co., of St. Louis, and was settled for by notes in pursuance of the contract. The whiskey was in this condition when, on the 9th of January, 1883, Mr. Conrad, at St. Louis, acting under the name and style of C. Conrad & Co., issued the warehouse receipts already spoken of, under which C. Conrad & Co. purported to have received, into their bonded warehouse at Silver Creek, two hundred and seventy-five barrels of whiskey for Paulina Vogelsang, fifty barrels for Elly Conrad, fifty barrels for Helena Paulsen and forty barrels for Mr. Schloeter. Mrs. Vogelsang was the mother-in-law of Conrad; Elly Conrad was his sister-in-law; Helena Paulsen was his mother-in-law's sister, and Schloeter had formerly been his porter. His evidence tends to show that he was indebted to them in various sums, exclusive of interest, which debts had been of long standing and without security. Without any solicitation whatever upon the part of any of these creditors, he handed to them respectively 1. . papers purporting to be warehouse receipts, together with bills of parcels and copies of gaugers' certificates, as collateral security for the debts which he owed them respectively. He asked no concessions whatever from them on handing them these papers, and they made no concessions to him whatever.

It should be here stated that the evidence requires us to lay out of view any conception or conjecture that this was a conveyance designed by Conrad to hinder, delay or defraud his creditors; for though the preference of relatives as creditors for alleged past-due indebtedness is one of the common features of business failures,—so much as to require that such preferences should receive careful scrutiny at the hands of triers of the facts,—yet it is to be observed that there is no evidence in this case tending to show that these debts were not bona fide debts, or to take the case out of the ordinary case of a debtor in failing circumstances endeavoring to use his property to prefer some of his creditors. We wish to get the idea out of the way that we proceed upon any conception—the least possible—of these conveyances being simulated, or of their being made to the use of Conrad, and to make it clear that we deal with the rights of the plaintiffs precisely as we would deal with those rights if they were bankers whom Conrad had desired to secure for previous advances, made to him under circumstances which, in his view, rendered it obligatory upon him to secure them at the expense of other creditors. No fraud, either in fact or law, is imputable to the plaintiffs, nor is any imputable to Conrad, unless it be found in an unauthorized use of the authority which had been conferred on him to issue warehouse receipts—of which we shall speak further on.

In this connection it may be best to state, so far as they have not already been stated, the provisions of the Revised Statutes of the United States touching the custody of distilled spirits in bond before the taxes have been paid. The whiskey, removed, as already stated, to the bonded warehouse, must, within the first five days of the next succeeding month, be entered for deposit in the warehouse by the distiller or owner, and the distiller or owner must give bond for the payment, within the next three years, of the taxes due thereon. U. S. Rev. Stat. Sup. p. 530, § 4.

It is also provided that the warehouse shall be provided by the distiller at his own expense, shall be situated on and shall constitute a part of the distillery premises and shall be under the direction and control of the collector for the district, and in charge of an internal revenue store keeper assigned thereto by the commissioner of internal revenue. U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 3271, 3273.

There is the further provision that it shall be in the joint custody of the store-keeper and the proprietor, but that it shall not be unlocked or remain open except in the presence of the store-keeper, and that no article shall be received into it, or delivered from it, by the store-keeper, except on the order of the collector. Id. § 3274.

This last provision is supplemented by a regulation of the internal revenue department, as follows: "Whenever any person is allowed access to the distillery warehouse, it must be done under the immediate supervision of the store-keeper. The distiller, or his employes, may be allowed access to the warehouse for the purpose of examining the spirits, repairing the cooperage, or changing the packages to prevent waste." If the commissioner of internal revenue deems the warehouse unsafe, he may require the whiskey stored therein to be removed, under the direction of the collector, to such warehouse as he may designate, and may have it sold if the owner fails to have the removal made. Id. § 3273.

It is further provided that, when the owner shall desire to withdraw the whiskey from the warehouse, he may file with the collector notice thereof, describing the whiskey, and requesting that it be re-gauged. U. S. Rev. Stat. Sup. p. 534, § 17.

A "withdrawal entry" must then be made, stating the date of entry into the warehouse and by whom made, together with other matters of description; and thereon, upon the payment of the tax, the collector must issue his order to the store-keeper in charge of the warehouse for the delivery of the whiskey. U. S. Rev. Stat. § 3304.

Thereupon the whiskey is re-gauged, and the cask is branded with the name of the distiller and stamped with the tax-paid stamp. U. S. Rev. Stat. § 3295.

Thereafter it shall not be stored nor shall it be allowed to remain on the distillery premises. Id. § 3296.

There is also a provision for the withdrawal of distilled spirits from the warehouse by the owner for exportation, without the payment of taxes. Id. § 3320.

Upon the foregoing facts the trial court has held that Stagg, Hume & Co., at the time when Conrad delivered the warehouse receipts to the plaintiffs, had such a possession of the whiskey as entitled them to a vendor's lien. The question now to be considered is, whether the facts admit of such an interpretation—not whether they do not admit of a contrary interpretation. For it is to be observed that where the facts are numerous and equivocal—susceptible of different inferences in respect of the question: What was the real intent of the parties?—the question whether there has been such a delivery as defeats the vendor's lien, or puts an end to the right of stoppage in transitu, is a question of fact for a jury. Chandler v. Fulton, 10 Tex. 2, 60 Am. Dec. 188; Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Phillips, 60 Ill. 190, 193.

On the analogous question, whether there has been such a delivery as will pass title and make an executed sale, the rule is the same. "Where the law can pronounce, upon a state of facts, that there is or is not, a delivery and acceptance, it is a question of law to be decided by the court. But where there may be uncertainty and difficulty in determining the true intent of the parties respecting the delivery and acceptance from the facts proved, the question of acceptance is to be decided by the jury." Houllatte v. Tallman, 14 Ma. 400; Glass v. Gelvin, 80 Mo. 297, 300.

More briefly, it is said: "When there is no dispute as to the facts, it is a question of law; when the evidence is conflicting, the jury must decide." Glass v. Gelvin, supra; Hatch v. Dayley, 10 Cush. 20.

In the case before us the facts were very numerous, and on some points the evidence was conflicting. Interpreted in the light of the contract alone, they become comparatively simple. Interpreted independently of the contract, the inferences to be drawn from them are exceedingly doubtful. So far as they were properly susceptible of interpretation, independently of the contract, the inferences to be drawn from them were inferences of fact which addressed themselves to the judgment of the circuit judge, who tried the case, sitting as a jury. We cannot review his conclusions of fact on this appeal, unless we see, from his rulings upon the instructions, that he was mistaken in respect of the inferences of law to be deduced from certain facts. Here, as elsewhere, where the law characterizes a fact or a state of facts in a given way, if it appears from the record that the trial judge has characterized such fact or state of facts in a different way, it is within our office to review and correct his decision; but we have no control over his conclusions in respect of mere inferences of fact, provided they are fairly within the scope of the evidence. We shall take up, then, the leading incidents of fact which the evidence tends to show, and inquire whether the learned judge drew from them in any instance a conclusion contrary to that imputed by the law.

It may make our views clearer if, before proceeding to do this, we state some of the established and leading incidents of a vendor's lien. To begin, it should be observed that the existence of a vendor's lien always presupposes that the title to the goods has passed to the vendee; since it would be an incongruous conception that a vendor might have a lien upon his own goods. In this case, the question of title is entirely out of the contest. The defense of a vendor's lien in Stagg, Hume & Co. concedes that the title to the goods had passed to Conrad.

It is next to be observed that a vendor's lien is in no sense a right of reversion. On the contrary, it proceeds in affirmation of the contract, and as a means of its enforcement. It is in the nature of a pledge raised or created by the law, upon the happening of the insolvency of the vendee, to secure the unpaid purchase money to the vendor. It is a mere right of detention and sale, to satisfy the unpaid purchase money. At the outset, in every sale, where the contrary is not stipulated, the implication of law is that the purchase price is to be paid, as a condition precedent, before the vendor shall be obliged to part with his goods. Blaram v. Sanders, 4 Barn. & C. 941, 948, Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Phillips, 60 Ill. 190, 198; Arnold v. Delano, 4 Cush. 88, 89.

But this right to retain the goods until the purchase money is paid is waived by any stipulations in the contract of sale which are inconsistent with its exercise. Pickett v. Bullock, 88 N. H. 854.

It is waived by giving time for payment, and especially by taking a bill or note to secure the payment of the purchase price. Chambers v. Davidson, L. R. 1 P. C. 805, 4 Moore, P. C. N. B. 157; Spartan v. Dencke, 10 C. B. 312; Dixon v. Yates, 5 Barn. & Ad. 313, Arnold v. Delano, 4 Cush. 88, 89; Throop v. Hart, 7 Duvall, 512, 531.

But this waiver is said to take place upon the implied condition that the vendee will keep his credit good until the term of the credit shall have expired. Arnold v. Delano, supra, Thompson v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 28 Md. 396, 406.

If, therefore, the purchaser becomes insolvent before the goods are delivered, the lien at once revives. Dixon v. Yates, 5 Barn. & Ad. 313, 341; Arnold v. Delano and Throop v. Hart, supra.

Although there is some controversy as to the nature of the insolvency which will revive this right, yet it is agreed on all hands that an insolvency in the mercantile sense—an inability to pay one's debts as fast as they mature, evidenced by a stoppage of payment, an assignment for the benefit of creditors, a petition in bankruptcy, or the like—is sufficient. Such an insolvency indisputably supervened in this case before Stagg, Hume & Co. undertook, by levying attachments on the goods, to exercise their supposed right of lien.

There is a controversy in this case in respect of the general theory of the law as to the nature of the delivery which will defeat the vendor's lien. The contention of the plaintiffs is that such a delivery, actual or constructive, as would amount to an "actual receipt" of the goods, within the meaning of the seventeenth section of the English Statute of Frauds, will in all cases operate to defeat the lien of the vendor. This position is undeniably logical; but the cases in which this statement of doctrine is found are nearly all cases in which the question in judgment was the Statute of Frauds, and not the vendor's lien. It would hence be extremely hazardous to rest our judgment upon what judges, however eminent, have said in cases where they were not considering the question which we are considering. Besides, a little examination will show that this contention is not a sound one. The single case of stoppage in transitu proves this. By all the authorities, when a carrier receives goods from a vendor for shipment to the vendee, there has been such an actual receipt as satisfies the Statute of Frauds, and by all the authorities there has not been such a delivery as puts an end to the right of stoppage in transitu. If it is answered that the right of stoppage in transitu is one thing, and that the vendor's lien is another thing, it is only necessary to appeal to the judicial reports to show that the two are universally regarded as the same right exercised under different circumstances. The right of stoppage in transitu is said to be a mere extension of the vendor's lien. Balcock v. Bonnell, 80 N. Y. 244, Newhall v. Vargas, 15 Me. 319, Mahr v. Boston & A. R. Co. 106 Mass. 67, 70, White v. Welch, 38 Pa. 396, 420; Leah v. Peters, 63 Ala. 243, 25 Am. Rep. 17, 19; Newhall v. Central Pac. R. Co. 51 Cal. 345, 21 Am. Rep. 713; Rowley v. Siglow, 12 Pick. 307, 313; Benedict v. Schaeffle, 12 Ohio St. 515, 521; Schwabacher v. Kana, 18 Mo. App. 126, 129.

It is simply the right which the law accords to the unpaid vendor, upon the happening of the insolvency of the vendee, to resume his possession and with it his vendor's lien, and when his possession is resumed his rights are worked out by a sale of the goods on notice, and an application of the proceeds to the payment of the purchase price, precisely as in the case of the vendor's lien. Blaram v. Sanders, 4 Barn. & C. 941; Boorman v. Nash, 9 Barn. & C. 145; Newhall v. Vargas, 15 Me. 341.

It follows from this statement, that, where the right of stoppage in transitu exists, the vendor's lien, a fortiori, exists. In other words, if there has been such a delivery, before the goods are started on their voyage, as cuts off the vendor's lien, there is no transitu, in the sense which supports the right of stoppage in transitu.

In view of these and other considerations, eminent judges have denied the proposition that the test, whether there has been a delivery to satisfy the Statute of Frauds, is a safe test of the non-existence of the vendor's lien. Robinson. Ch. J., in Wagg v. Drake, 16 U. C. Q. B. 259; Miller, J., in Thompson v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 28 Md. 396, 407; Townsend v. Hargreaves, 118 Mass. 325, 333.

It has been held, on the most obvious grounds, that if a seller of merchandise, in ordor to maintain his lien for the price, refuses to permit the purchaser to take possession of it, but keeps it in his own personal custody, he thereby prevents an acceptance and receipt of it by the purchaser, such as is necessary to satisfy the Statute of Frauds. Safford v. McDonough, 120 Mass. 280.

This is in accordance with what was said by Holroyd, J., that, "as long as the seller preserves his control over the goods, so as to retain his lien, he prevents the vendee from accepting and receiving them as his own, within the meaning of the Statute,"—meaning the Statute of Frauds. Baldry v. Parker, 3 Barn. & C. 57, 44.

This need not be disputed, because the converse of the proposition is not necessarily true. On the other hand, there are decisions which affirm that there may be an acceptance which satisfies the Statute of Frauds in the case of a parol sale, and yet which does not even pass the title to the vendee. Pinhorn v. Mattox, 53 N. H. 600; Dodley v. Farley, 13 Ad. & El. 632.

So there may be a delivery such as puts an end to the right of stoppage in transitu, and yet no acceptance and receipt such as satisfies the Statute of Frauds. Smith v. Hudson, 6 Best & S. 431, 445.

From the language of the Statute of Frauds it will be perceived that there must not only be an actual receipt of the goods, but there must also be an acceptance. This draws the question into the domain of intent; and the most cursory reading of the cases will show that the courts regard the question, whether there has been such an acceptance and actual receipt as satisfies the Statute of Frauds, as largely a question of intent. But the existence of the vendor's lien is not in an equal sense a question of intent; because, when a sale is made and executed, so as to pass title to the vendee, the vendor never intends to detain the goods, except in those cases where to do so is in accordance with the course of business which subsists between the parties (of which the books afford some instances), or unless such is the actual agreement; but in nearly all cases the intent is that the title shall pass, and that the vendee shall take the goods at his pleasure, and the corresponding expectation is that he will pay for them according to the terms of the contract. The vendor's lien is thus raised, not in pursuance of the intent of the parties, but by implication of law, in a state of things which the vendor, and presumptively the vendee, never intended nor expected. It is quite clear, therefore, that we cannot regard the test of delivery to satisfy the Statute of Frauds as a safe test by which to determine the existence or non-existence of the vendor's lien.

On the contrary, we affirm that, as between the vendor and vendee, laying out of view the rights of subsequent purchasers from the vendee, the vendor's lien is not divested by any species of constructive delivery, so long as he retains the actual custody of the goods, either by himself or by his own agent or servant.

This doctrine is supported by the best English and American adjudications. In 1877, it was said by Sir Barnes Peacock, in giving the judgment of the English privy council, "to be clearly settled, that unless actual possession has been delivered to the purchaser, the vendor is not deprived of his right of lien as against the assignees of the purchaser in the event of his insolvency." Griss v. Richardson, 3 App. Cas. 319, 320.

"There is," said Shaw, Ch. J., "manifestly a marked distinction between those cases which, as between the vendor and vendee upon a contract of sale, go to make a constructive delivery and to vest the property in the vendee, and that actual delivery by the vendor to the vendee which puts an end to the right of the vendor to hold the goods as security for the price." Arnold v. Delano, 4 Cush. 33, 38, quoted with approval in Thompson v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 28 Md. 396, 406.

To the same effect is Newhall v. Fargas, 15 Me. 314, 319.

"The lien of the vendor," says Miller, J., "always exists until he voluntarily and utterly resigns the possession of the goods sold, and all right to detain them. So long as the vendor does not surrender actual possession, his lien remains, although he may have performed acts which amount to a constructive delivery, so as to pass the title or avoid the Statute,"—meaning the Statute of Frauds. Thompson v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 28 Md. 393, 407.

Speaking upon the same subject, it was said in a later Massachusetts case by Mr Justice Wells: "Regarding the sale and order for delivery as sufficient to make it effectual to pass title as between the parties, still until actual and full delivery, the seller is not deprived of his right to insist upon his lien for the price. Delivery to a carrier for transportation to the purchaser is sufficient to pass the title, and authorize the carrier to complete the delivery and make it absolute. But until so made absolute, the seller may revoke his authority and thus intercept the transmission, restore himself to possession and retain his lien. The same principle applies in all cases of inchoate delivery, or whatever mode of transmission of possession. Until the delivery is actual and absolute, the seller may suspend it and revoke the authority of any intermediary to perfect it." Kessler v. Goodwin, 111 Mass. 490, 492.

"The rule," said Lowrie, J., "is that, so long as the vendor has actual possession of the goods, or as they are in the custody of his agents, and while they are in transit from him to the vendee, he has the right to refuse or countermand the final delivery, if the vendee be in failing circumstances." It was therefore held that the rejection of evidence tending to show a constructive delivery under a contract of sale was unimportant, where the goods had not been removed after the sale, but continued in the store and custody of the vendor until the published insolvency of the vendee. White v. Walsh, 38 Pa. 396, 420.

Even where the goods were ponderous and lay by the road side, and an agent of the vendor had pointed them out to the agent of the vendee for the purpose of delivery to him, and a minute of the transaction had been entered in the books of the vendor, charging the goods to the vendee,—it was held that this, although a complete delivery to transfer title to the vendee, did not cut off the vendor's lien upon the happening of the insolvency of the vendee, the goods remaining in the same position as when

So, the delivery of a bill of lading, warehouse receipt, bought-and-sold note, delivery order, sale ticket, carrier's receipt or any other writing intended by the parties or made by commercial usage a symbol of the goods themselves, passes constructive possession to the vendee; and yet nothing is more clear than that, as between the vendor and vendee themselves, and in many cases as between the vendor and a sub-vendee, the latter being a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration, such symbolical delivery does not devert the vendor's lien, provided the vendor remain in actual custody of the goods. Thus, where the goods are delivered to a carrier by the vendor for shipment to the vendee, the vendor, in the ordinary course of business, transmits the bill of lading to the vendee, but this, on the most familiar grounds, does not cut off the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu. In support of this statement of doctrine, we need not go further than refer to the decision of our supreme court, holding that where a sale is not made upon credit, although the goods contracted for have been set apart and identified in the storehouse of the vendor, and although they have been sold by the vendee to a sub-vendee, and a delivery order for them, given by the vendee to the sub-vendee, on the vendor, has been presented by the sub-vendee to the original vendor, and has been by him accepted in writing,—yet, if the original vendee becomes insolvent, leaving the purchase price unpaid, before the original vendor has actually parted with the goods, he may still exercise his right of lien upon them, notwithstanding the rights of the sub-vendee. In such case, the sub-vendee acquires no greater rights than his vendor, the original vendee. Southwestern F. & C. Exp. Co. v. Plant, 45 Mo. 517, construing Whitehouse v. Frost, 12 East. 614, reaffirming Southwestern Freight Co. v. Standard, 44 Mo. 71, citing and approving Miles v. Gorton, 2 Crompt. & M. 504, and Tanner v. Sewell, 14 Mees. & W. 28.

The terms of the sale, it is true, contemplated a cash payment, and this, as already pointed out, was a condition precedent to the right of the vendee to take the goods. But there can be no distinction in principle between the kind of possession which will support the vendor's lien before it is waived, and the kind of possession which will support it after it has revived.

Let us next apply these principles to the salient facts of the present case, and look more closely to see how the judicial decisions have characterized those facts.

The contract already set out required the whiskey to be invoiced, when made, to C. Conrad & Co.; and this, as already stated, was accordingly done. But it has been held that the lien of the vendor is not destroyed by invoicing the goods to the purchaser. Miles v. Gorton, supra; Dixon v. Yates, 5 Barn. & Ad. 313.

The Superior Court of the City of New York—a court, it may be stated, which has always stood high upon commercial questions,—has gone further than this, and has held, in an able and well-considered opinion by Charles F. Daly, J., that the delivery of a bill of parcels of the goods sold by the vendor to the vendee does not affect the vendor's lien as to so much of the goods as remain in his possession, even as against a sub-vendee. Hamburger v. Rodman, 9 Daly, 98.

The court was so well assured of the grounds upon which it decided this case that it refused to grant an appeal from its decision. We may therefore dismiss from further view the fact that the goods were invoiced to Conrad, and that bills of parcels, with gaugers' certificates, were delivered to him.

This contract also required the goods to be marked with the name of C. Conrad & Co. as distillers, the brands to be furnished by Stagg, Hume & Co.; and the barrels were so branded. But it has been held, where the subject of the sale was rum in puncheons, which lay in the warehouse of a third person, where they had been deposited by the original vendor, that the act of a sub-vendee, with the consent of the warehouseman, in marking the initials of the sub-vendee upon them, in gauging them, and even in coopering them, did not amount to a taking possession such as deverted the original vendor's lien,—though it was conceded that taking samples and coopering were circumstances from which a jury might infer an actual delivery of the whole. Dixon v. Yates, supra.

This contract provided that the goods should be stored in United States Warehouse No 541, of the Eastern District of Kentucky, and that storage should be charged at the rate of five cents per barrel per month from the date of entry; that is, that storage should be charged by Stagg, Hume & Co. against C. Conrad & Co. But while there is some discredited authority—all of it more than fifty years old—to the effect that the vendor's lien is discharged so that it will not revive on the insolvency of the vendee by his agreeing to hold the goods as warehouseman for the vendee (Hurry v. Mangler, 1 Camp. 452, Barratt v. Goddard, 3 Mason, 107; Upham v. Searle, 3 Pick. 39), yet the more recent and better view is that the vendor's lien is not destroyed by an agreement between the vendor and the vendee, that the goods shall remain in the warehouse of the vendor, subject to the payment of warehouse rent by the vendee. Grice v. Richardson, 3 App. Cas. 319, Miles v. Gorton, 2 Crompt. & M. 504, 4 Tyrwh. 295.

So it has been held that, where a part of the goods are taken away by the vendee, and warehouse rent paid in respect of such part, this will not prevent the exercise of the right of the vendor's lien upon the remainder. In such a case, it was ruled that the charge of warehouse rent by the vendor did not constitute such a delivery as to devert his lien. Wicks v. Hasell, 9 Barn. & C. 379. See also Blossin v. Sanders, 4 Barn. & C. 941.

This is somewhat analogous to a ruling of our supreme court under the Statute of Frauds, where a contract was made for the sale of cattle in the field of the vendor. The purchaser told the vendor to keep the cattle and feed them at the purchaser's expense until he should send for them. This the vendor agreed to do, but upon the condition that if any of them died the purchaser should bear the loss, to which the purchaser assented. It was held that this was no delivery to take the contract out of the Statute of Frauds. Kirby v. Johnson, 29 Mo. 334.

Nor is such a case will the fact that the vendor gives to the vendee a delivery order, reciting that the vendor holds the goods to the order of the vendee rent free, until a date named, be such a delivery as to devest the vendor's lien. Twenley v. Crump, 4 Ad. & El. 58.

Concerning the decisions which assert the opposing view, it should be said that the earliest of them, Hurry v. Manley, 1 Camp. 452, was a vis prius decision of Lord Ellenborough, and it need scarcely be said that a vis prius decision by a judge, however eminent, must have little weight, where the same question has been subsequently ruled otherwise in the same jurisdiction by a court in bono. The second of those cases, Barrett v. Gaddard, supra, was likewise a vis prius decision of Mr Justice Story at circuit. That judge was an eminent commentator, more noted for the exuberance of his learning than for the soundness of his judgment or the accuracy of his statement. His opinion in the case referred to is a singular confusion of the three subjects of delivery to pass title as between vendor and vendee at common law; of delivery to satisfy the Statute of Frauds, and of delivery to devest the vendor's lien or cut off the right of stoppage in transitu. It was denied in England, in Townley v. Crump, supra. It was severally criticized in Pennsylvania by Lowrie, Ch. J., in White v. Walsh, 28 Pa. 306, 421. It was denied in the New York Court of Common Pleas, in Hamburger v. Rodman, 9 Daly, 93, 98, and it was finally denied in the same circuit where it was pronounced, on the authority of Arnold v. Delano, 4 Cush. 33,—Mr. District Judge Lowell saying: "I take the modern doctrine to be that, if the buyer stops payment before the seller has actually parted with possession, though after he has parted with his title, if no rights of innocent third persons have intervened, his lien revives." Parker v. Byrnes, 1 Lowell, 339, 340.

The third case, Chapman v. Seville, 8 Pick. 20, though not overruled in terms, has been overruled in principle, by the subsequent case of Arnold v. Delano, 4 Cush. 33, and by subsequent cases in the same jurisdiction, which assert that the vendor's lien is not gone so long as he retains actual possession.

In determining whether a contract of sale has been executed so as to pass title to the goods, or whether there has been a delivery such as satisfies the Statute of Frauds, the courts frequently appeal to a principle thus stated by Mr. Chitty: "Although the contract for a sale of goods be complete and binding in other respects, the property in them remains in the vendor and at his risk, if a material fact remains to be done before the delivery, either to distinguish the goods, or ascertain the price thereof." Chitty, Cont. 375, as quoted in Southwestern F. & C. Press Co. v. Standard, 44 Mo. 71, 73.

But this is not a conclusive inference. It is rather in the nature of a prima facie presumption, which may be rebutted by circumstances. For instance, the title may pass, although marking, weighing or measuring is thereafter to be performed in order to ascertain the amount to be paid. Ober v. Carson, 62 Mo. 209, 218; Thompson v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 28 Md. 396, 404, Southwestern F. & C. Press Co. v. Standard, supra.

"Presumptively," says Cooley, Ch. J., "the title does not pass, even though the articles be designated, so long as anything remains to be done to determine the sum to be paid; but this is only a presumption, and is liable to be overcome by such facts and circumstances as indicate an intent in the parties to the contrary." Byles v. Colier, 54 Mich. 1, 5.

Moreover, the case where such a presumption arises is to be distinguished from the case where there has been such a delivery as would authorize a jury to find that the parties intended that title should pass, and yet where the goods were left in the hands of the vendor to be the subject of some further treatment,—as where a piano sold to the vendee was left in the vendor's shop to be finished in a certain way. Thorndyke v. Bell, 114 Mass. 116.

By analogy, the courts have appealed to a similar principle for the purpose of determining whether there has been such an actual delivery as cuts off the right of stoppage in transitu, or devests the vendor of his lien. Thus, a broker effected a sale of thirty tons of rosin, and notified his principal as follows: "I have this day sold to David Bromer thirty tons of London-made rosin, more or less, at 12s. per cwt., lying in mts at the wharf of Lys & Co., payment by a bill at six months,"—signed by the broker. Still later the plaintiffs (the vendors) sent an order to the wharfingers to weigh and deliver the rosin, upon which the latter gave notice to the vendee that they had received such order from the vendors. Shortly afterwards the vendee became insolvent, and, the rosin still lying at the wharf, the vendors gave the wharfinger notice not to deliver it. It was held that the property had not vested in the vendee, the decision proceeding upon the principle "that the order sent by the vendor to the wharfinger to deliver the goods is sufficient to pass title to the vendee, provided nothing remains to be done but to make the delivery. If it be necessary by the terms of the contract, or by the order to the wharfinger, that anything should be done previous to the delivery, the transfer is not complete till that thing be done. It is impossible to say, in the present case, that something was not to be done. The order was to weigh and deliver; that act, therefore, which was to precede delivery, not having taken place, the property did not pass to Bromer." Withers v. Lys, 1 Holt. N. P. 18, opinion by Gibbs, Ch. J.

It is perceived that, although the judge who decided this case placed his decision upon the ground that the right of property had not passed, the same reasons would have resulted in the conclusion that the vendor had not parted with his possession in a manner so entire as to cut off his lien.

A case was found in one of the legal periodicals where this principle was directly applied in solving the question whether a vendor had lost his right of lien. The decision was made by three referees, all of them eminent in the legal profession. Hon. William F. Allen, subsequently a judge of the New York Court of Appeals; Hon. Joseph F. Bosworth, subsequently a judge of the Superior Court of the City of New York; and Hon. Theodore W. Dwight, president of the law faculty of Columbia College, and some time a judge of the New York Commission of Appeals. These referees delivered an opinion of exceptional ability, in which, on the facts before them, they resolved that the following propositions were established by the authorities: "Where the goods, at the time the contract of sale is made, though in the legal custody and control, are not in the actual possession, of the vendor, but are so situated that the purchaser cannot obtain actual possession until a specific act is done by the vendor, if the vendee becomes insolvent before this act has been done, and the actual possession of the goods has not been changed, the vendor may detain the goods as security for the payment of the contract price, and, as a consequence, will not be compelled by a court of equity to perform the act in question. The right of detention, in case of the intervening insolvency of the vendee, may be exercised by the vendor so long as the vendee has neither obtained actual possession, nor been furnished by the vendor with the exclusive means and power of controlling the possession." Gill v. Purnslett, 7 Am. Law Reg. N. S. 672, 676.

The facts in this case sustain a considerable analogy to the facts of the case now before us. A had purchased a quantity of teas from B. The goods were placed in the bonded warehouse of a third person, and were there entered in the name of B, the vendor. The sale was upon a credit, at a specified price, and the duties were to be paid by the vendee as a part of the price. He had withdrawn, by permission of the vendor, portions of the goods at different times, paying the duties on such portions. Before the credit expired, the vendor gave to him an order on the bonded warehouse, directing the latter to transfer the residue of the goods to the name of the vendee, which was accordingly done. But, as between the parties and the government, the goods still remained in the name of the vendor, and could not be withdrawn from the warehouse under the regulations of the Treasury Department, except by what is termed a "withdrawal entry" signed by the vendor, or by someone authorized by him in writing. While the goods were in this condition, the vendee became insolvent. After his insolvency, he demanded that the vendor should sign the necessary withdrawal entry, which the latter refused to do, except upon full payment of the price. It was held that an act, to wit, the signing of the withdrawal entry by the vendor, remained to be done, as between himself and the vendee, which was of such a nature that there was no delivery, either actual or constructive, and that the vendor's lien for the unpaid purchase money subsisted. Gill v. Purnslett, supra.

We assume that, under the Internal Revenue Statutes above set out, the withdrawal entry, in the case before us, could only be made by the distilling company in whose name the deposit entry was made, and this, as already shown, was—not C. Conrad & Co., simply, but "The Silver Creek Distilling Company, doing business as C. Conrad & Co."

In a case still more like the present, which turned upon this principle, certain distilled whiskey was stored in a government warehouse in Terre Haute, under the provisions of the Internal Revenue Laws, in the name of the vendor, who paid the insurance thereon, and who sold the whiskey, so stored, to the vendee on a credit, and caused it to be inspected and gauged, as is required by the Internal Revenue Laws; whereupon the government store keeper certified that the whiskey was in the store-house, "Mr. Edward Dewey, of Boston (the vendee) being the owner of said whiskey, as per Messrs. Mohr & Solomon's (the vendor's) order." It was a part of the contract of sale that the vendor should, from time to time as the vendee should request, ship the goods from the bonded warehouse and pay the warehouse charges, taxes, stamps and insurance, drawing on the vendee at ten days' sight for the amounts so paid. Down to this point, it is perceived that the whiskey was similarly situated to the whiskey in the case before us. It was, as here, in a government warehouse. The title, as here, had been transferred from the vendor to the vendee. The government warehouseman had attorned, so to speak, to the vendee, by issuing the certificate recognizing the vendee as the owner; and yet it was held that, drafts drawn against a shipment of the whiskey having been protested, these facts did not determine the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu, but that the vendor might stop them and maintain replevin for them while they were yet in the hands of the carrier in Boston. The court, speaking through Mr. Justice Morton, said: "Something remained to be done by the vendors under the contract of sale, before the goods would come into the possession of the vendee at the place of destination. The contract contemplated that they were to forward them to Boston. If the goods had been and remained in their actual possession as vendors until they forwarded them, on the order of Dewey, their right of stoppage in transitu would have been unquestionable. The result is the same, though they remained stored in a government warehouse, unless the transfer to Dewey on the records of the warehouse is to be treated as a termination of the transit. But, as we have seen, the terms of the sale provided that the plaintiffs should forward the goods to Boston as their place of destination, and the storage in the warehouse was preliminary to their transit, and not the termination of it. It is no answer to this view to say that there was a constructive delivery of the whiskey to Dewey, which vested the property in him, and that he had the right to take possession of it and withdraw it from the warehouse." Mohr v. Boston & A. R. Co. 100 Mass. 67, 71.

If this conclusion was a sound one,—and, in favor of the strong equity upon which the vendor's right of lien subsists, we do not see why it was not,—it seems, when applied to the contract in evidence in this case, decisive of the existence of the vendor's lien, unless we are to hold that a vendor has a better right of detainer after the goods leave his warehouse and get into the hands of a carrier, than while they are yet in his warehouse.

Let us next inquire how this principle applies to the contract before us. It stipulated for the doing of three things by the vendor before the delivery should be complete. These were: (1) To give care and attention to the packages while in the government warehouse: "That all care and attention shall be given the packages while in store, by the party of the first part." (2) To place insurance upon the property, if so required by the vendee: "That the party of the first part, if desired to do so by the party of the second part, shall place insurance, loss, if any, payable to the party of the second part, who shall pay the premium at not to exceed current rates." (3) And, finally, to complete the delivery of the property itself: "That, upon release from bond and payment of United States and state taxes and storage, by the party of the second part, the packages shall be delivered, free of charge, by the party of the first part, on board the cars at Silver Creek, Kentucky."

Presumptively, there had been no actual delivery of the property to the vendee until the last of these three things was performed, unless the other circumstances surrounding the transaction were such as to repel the presumption. Whether they were was a question of fact, which has been resolved against the plaintiffs by the trier of the facts, and his resolution is conclusive upon us.

It has been argued with much force that this last-quoted clause of the contract, requiring the delivery of the goods free on board at Silver Creek, is to be regarded, when considered in the light of the facts of the case, as merely a contract to perform an additional service in respect of the property after delivery had in fact taken place. We do not say that the trial court might not have so regarded it. The case of Cooper v. Bill, & Hurst, & Co. 721, required the subject of the sale (certain unaquarred logs of timber) "to be delivered to boats when required." They were taken to the side of the canal and deposited on the bank near the landing, but not near enough to the boats, it would seem, to satisfy the requirement of the contract. While so deposited, the vendee, by his agents, took actual possession, marked the logs with his initials and expended five pounds in squaring them. It was held that there had been here such a delivery as devested the vendor of his right of lien. Although the case was very badly considered,—so badly that it would seem that two of the judges had not in their minds any sound conception as to the nature of the vendor's lien,—yet the conclusion was obviously right, on the analogy of the rule in the law of stoppage in transitu,—that the vendee may intercept the transit and take possession before the goods have arrived at the place appointed for delivery, which possession will end the right of stoppage of the vendor. If the removal of the whiskey in this case from the distillery to the bonded warehouse and thence to the cars, which the evidence shows would come to a side track by the side of the warehouse, could be regarded as a transit, and if it had appeared that C. Conrad & Co. had, by themselves or agents, intercepted the transit and taken actual possession of the whiskey while it was in the bonded warehouse,—this, of course, would have put an end to the vendor's lien, notwithstanding the provision of the contract requiring the vendors to deliver the goods free on board the cars. But no such facts appear in the record,—unless the collection of facts that the distillery was run in the name of C. Conrad & Co., that the warehouse had above its door the same name, that the whiskey was branded in the same name, and that the correspondence to and fro between Silver Creek, Kentucky and St. Louis, was sometimes conducted as though the warehouse was actually that of C. Conrad & Co.—were facts from which the trial court was conclusively bound to find an actual delivery of the whiskey to C. Conrad & Co. But to hold, as a conclusion of law, that the facts prove such a delivery, would make them prove too much; because it would make them prove that C. Conrad & Co. were the distillers, in contradiction of the contract under which the whiskey was made, which provided that Stagg, Hume & Co. should make the whiskey, and that, although they should use the name of C. Conrad & Co. as distillers, they should exonerate C. Conrad & Co. from all liability to the government for the conduct of the distillery. It would also involve the absurdity of holding that, while the warehouse was that of C. Conrad & Co., yet they were under obligations by the terms of the contract to pay storage for keeping their whiskey in it to Stagg, Hume & Co. In fact, it would turn the whole transaction upside down, devert the parties of the character of vendor and vendee and turn them into the relation of principal and agent, C. Conrad & Co. being the principals and proprietors, and Stagg, Hume & Co. being merely their agents. Thus, if we do not ignore the language of the contract, throw it away, and get it entirely out of sight, we must, in order to uphold this contention, turn the whole transaction into elemental nonsense.

The question has been presented in another aspect by the very able argument which has been made on behalf of the plaintiffs. The contention is this: That where the goods which have been sold are deposited in the warehouse of a third person, to the use of the vendee, there has been a delivery such as cuts off the vendor's lien, under the English law, where there has been an attornment by the warehouseman to the vendee, and, under the American law, without such attornment; that the goods in this case were warehoused with a third party, which third party was either the government store-keeper, who had the keys and the actual possession of the warehouse, or else the Silver Creek Distilling Company, which was the owner of the warehouse; and that, by thus being placed in the warehouse of a third party, they were placed under the dominion and control of the vendee, so far as could be done while the government tax remained unpaid, which devested the possession of the vendors and with it their lien. We shall consider this question in the alternative aspect of the government store-keeper being the warehouseman, and of the Silver Creek Distilling Company being the warehouseman.

In the first aspect of the question, it is to be observed that the effect of depositing goods in the custom house, or in a bonded warehouse, to secure the payment of government fees, has been several times considered by the courts in respect of a question which is strictly analogous in the question of delivery to defeat the vendor's lien, namely the question whether, after goods have arrived at the end of a voyage, there has been such an actual delivery to the consignee as cuts off the right of stoppage in transitu, and it has been uniformly held that the fact of a deposit of the goods in a government warehouse does not determine the right. Northey v. Field, 2 Esp. 818. Donath v. Broomhead, 7 Pa. 301. Harris v. Pratt, 17 N. Y. 349. Mottram v. Hayer, 5 Denio, 629.

And it is well known that in such cases the consignee has generally nothing further to do in order to get the goods out of the warehouse and into the actual possession of the consignee. The consignee really enters the goods at the custom house, as was done by his assignee in the case of Harris v. Pratt, supra. No strength, therefore, can be derived in favor of the hypothesis of the plaintiffs, from the fact that these goods were in the possession of the government store-keeper. It is to be observed that the government store-keeper is not a warehouseman for any purpose of commerce. He simply holds the goods in the course of transmission, so to speak, between the manufacturer and the consumer, until the government dues are paid. His position ought not to be construed so as to interrupt or impair the rights of vendor, vendee or pledgee, beyond what the terms of the statute under which he holds possession absolutely require. The language of Judge Wagner in Ober v. Carson, 62 Mo. 209, 215, fully justifies us in this conclusion.

But a further argument has been pressed upon us, in favor of the plaintiffs, upon the sections of the federal statute, already quoted, which imply that the store-keeper, on the order of the collector, upon the payment of the government dues, is to deliver the goods to the owner, and, as it is not disputed that Conrad was the owner, the argument derived from this is that the government store-keeper held the goods in a sense as his bailee, to be delivered to him or to his assignee upon the payment of the dues. This argument, like other arguments which have been pressed upon us in this case, proves too much for the case of these plaintiffs. We have already shown that, assuming the warehouse receipts which were delivered to them to be effective to make a symbolical delivery of the goods to them, yet this, under the evidence, did not make them the owners, but it merely made them pledgees. The well known distinction between a pledge and a chattel mortgage is that, in a chattel mortgage the title passes to the mortgagee, subject to a defeasance, while, in the case of a pledge, the title does not pass to the pledgee, but remains in the pledgor, but the possession passes to the pledgee for the purpose of securing the performance of the obligation intended by the parties. A pledgee, therefore, is not the owner, but the mere holder, of a possessory lien. If this argument were a sound one, then these pledgees would not have had the right, in the event of an attempt upon the part of the pledgor to repudiate the pledge, to pay the taxes and take the goods out of the government storehouse. But such a pledge would be utterly ineffective and nugatory unless the pledgees were accorded this right, and they could not be accorded this right without being regarded as the "owners" within the intentment of the Statute. We hold that Congress, in employing the word "owners," made use of a general word to avoid circumlocution and needless specification, and that this general word was a word of description, intended to designate any person who, upon the payment of the government dues, was in law entitled to the possession of the goods. When, in the cases before us, the sheriff in Kentucky levied upon these goods in the hands of the government store-keeper, and thereafter paid the taxes, they were properly delivered to him as the owner, within the intentment of the Statute. And yet he was not the owner in the sense in which that word is ordinarily employed, though he had the title for a limited and qualified purpose.

But if the Silver Creek Distilling Company is to be regarded as the warehouseman, then the conclusion is the same. The circuit court does not seem to have found, as a fact, what was the relation subsisting between the Silver Creek Distilling Company and Stagg, Hume & Co. Perhaps on the evidence either of the following conclusions was warrantable: (1) that the Silver Creek Distilling Company was the mere agent or servant of Stagg, Hume & Co. for the purpose of carrying out the contract subsisting between them and C. Conrad & Co.; or (2) that, in making this contract with C. Conrad & Co., Stagg, Hume & Co. were agents acting for an undisclosed principal, and that the Silver Creek Distilling Company was that principal. We do not see that it makes any difference in principle which of these views is taken. The fact remains that there was a substantial identity between Stagg, Hume & Co. and the Silver Creek Distilling Company, and that there was no privity between the Silver Creek Distilling Company and C. Conrad & Co. It does not appear that any letter was ever addressed by the Silver Creek Distilling Company to Conrad as such, or by him to them, and it is not clear, from the record, that he even knew of the existence of such a corporation. They were the mere fingers of Stagg, Hume & Co. to carry out their contract with C. Conrad & Co., or else Stagg, Hume & Co. were their mere agents to make the contract without disclosing them; and it does not seem to matter which, for the purposes of the question we are considering. If the Silver Creek Distilling Company were the real principals in the contract, then the case is that of the vendor holding the goods in his own warehouse. If they were the mere agents of Stagg, Hume & Co., then the case is that of Stagg, Hume & Co. holding the goods in the warehouse of their agent, for what a man does by his agent he does by himself. In either case the possession was the possession of the vendor, and carried with it a vendor's lien. That the circuit court has taken this view is shown by the following instructions, given of its own motion:

"If the court finds from the evidence that the contract of October 25, 1892, between Stagg, Hume & Co. and Charles W. Conrad, admitted to evidence, was entered into by Stagg, Hume & Co., and that the whiskey in controversy was made under said contract at the instance and request of Stagg, Hume & Co. by the Silver Creek Distilling Company, and placed by it in its bonded warehouse at Silver Creek under said contract, and that Charles W. Conrad failed and suspended business in January 1858, and that at the time of such failure Stagg, Hume & Co., or the Silver Creek Distilling Company, jointly with the storekeeper for the United States, were in actual possession of the said whiskey in said bonded warehouse, and that the notes given by Charles W. Conrad in settlement for said whiskey are now, and have always been, held by Stagg, Hume & Co.—then, the court declares, as a matter of law, that, at the time of said Conrad's failure and suspension of business, the said Stagg, Hume & Co. had a vendor's lien on said whiskey and a right to retain possession thereof, either themselves or by or through said distilling company, until they were paid therefor; provided, the court further finds from the evidence that, at the time the warehouse receipts for the whiskey in controversy were issued to plaintiffs, Charles W. Conrad was, in fact, insolvent, and, further, that neither the distilling company, for itself or on behalf of Stagg, Hume & Co., nor Stagg, Hume & Co., after they, or either of them, became aware of such insolvency, did, with full knowledge of the circumstances under which said receipts were issued, ratify their issuance to Charles W. Conrad."

IV We come now to the question of the effect of the symbolical delivery of the property to the plaintiffs as determining the vendor's lien. For the purposes of making more clear the view which we take, we shall assume that the evidence establishes that Stagg, Hume & Co. authorized Conrad to issue warehouse receipts in respect of the whiskey on store in the Government Warehouse No. 541, at Silver Creek, Kentucky. Whether the Silver Creek Distilling Company, as such, ever sanctioned the issue of such warehouse receipts, it is not material to inquire, since, as we have already stated, there was no privity of contract between that corporation and Conrad. If Stagg, Hume & Co. gave the authorization, it concluded them, if they were the real vendors; and it equally concluded the distilling company for which they were the agents, if the distilling company were the real vendors.

We ought, perhaps, to state here that we do not take the view upon which the circuit court proceeded, and which is embodied in the above instruction, that the symbolical delivery, which was attempted or effected by means of these warehouse receipts, became inoperative from the circumstance that, at the time of their issue, Charles W. Conrad was in fact insolvent. We can find no such principle in the cases which expound the nature of the vendor's lien and the analogous right of stoppage in transitu. Neither of these rights is of such a nature as to be self-executing. It is a right which the vendor may or may not assert, and if he does not assert it in time, it is lost. Stagg, Hume & Co. had not asserted it when these warehouse receipts were issued, and they could not thereafter assert it as against the holders of these warehouse receipts, provided the law placed them, in respect of the rights thereby acquired, on a better footing than that which was occupied by the transferors, C. Conrad & Co.

The general rule of the common law touching transfers of personal property is that the transferee acquires no better title than the transferor had; if the vendor had no title, the vendee gets none; if the pledgor had no title, the pledgee gets none; if the vendor or pledgor had a title, but subject to a lien in behalf of another person, the vendee or pledgee takes it burdened with such lien. This is unquestionably the general rule; but the rule has its exceptions. One exception known to the English common law is the well-known case of sales in market overt; but this exception is a stranger to American law, because in this country there are no markets overt. Another exception, founded in the custom of merchants, arises in the case of strictly negotiable paper, whereby the transferee of a bill of exchange or negotiable promissory note, who receives it in due course of trade, for a valuable consideration, before maturity, and without notice of any infirmities attaching to it, takes it discharged of any equities which may exist in respect of it between the original parties to it. Another exception, founded also in the custom of trade and analogous to the exception relating to commercial paper, relates to the symbolical delivery of goods in the hands of a carrier, effected by a transfer of the bill of lading. Still another exception, having its foundation, in this country, in the general usages of trade, of which the courts take judicial notice (Gibson v. Stevens, 49 U. S. 8 How 384, 209 [12 L. ed. 1128, 1129]), but confirmed in nearly all the States of the Union by statutes, relates to symbolical transfers of personal property in warehouses, by the transfer of warehouse receipts. Following the precedent set by the great case of Lack'arrow v. Mason, 9 T. R. 63, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 838, it is now the recognized law of this country that the owner of goods, or one having the legal right to sell or to pledge them, may invest another with the full title and constructive possession of them, by transferring to him a bill of lading or a warehouse receipt which has been issued as their symbolical representative, either by a carrier or a warehouseman in whose custody they are, so as to discharge the vendor's lien or his right of stoppage in transitu, if the transferee of the bill of lading or warehouse receipt receives it bona fide and for a valuable consideration.

But what is to be deemed a valuable consideration, within the meaning of this rule, is one in respect of which the decisions are in a very unsatisfactory state. The question whether one who takes an assignment of such a symbol of property merely as collateral security for a past indebtedness, without making any present advance, agreeing expressly or impliedly for an extension of time to the transferor, or, foregoing any benefit or advantage, is to be regarded as a purchaser for value within the meaning of this rule, is the one which we have now to decide; and it is a question upon which there is no direct authority in this State. Unfortunately, the authorities in respect of it in other jurisdictions are conflicting. The question has, within a comparatively short period, been decided both ways in England.

In Ridger v. Comptoir d'Escompte de Paris, L. R. 2 P. C. 808 (anno 1860), it was held by three judges, on an appeal from a colonial court, that one who takes a bill of lading merely as collateral security for a previous obligation is not a purchaser for a valuable consideration in the sense which cuts off the vendor's lien. "Doubtless," said Sir Joseph Napier, in giving the opinion of the court, "the vendor's claim cannot prevail against the claim of a transferee for value, given on the faith of a negotiable security fairly and honestly taken; to the extent to which he has so given value he has a prior claim. But the rule is founded on the reason of it, as already stated, assente ratione, assente ipse ius. Where there is no advance made or value given upon the faith of the documents, where the object is simply, by a sweeping clause, to gather in whatever may be got to recoup the creditor of a debtor who had become insolvent, for an improvident advance made upon the faith of a totally different security, where, upon the true construction of the assignment, no interest passed that would place the assignee in a better position than the assignor, and the bills of lading which subsequently came to hand were transferred expressly in performance of the agreement in this assignment and without other consideration whatsoever—it appears to their lordships that such a transfer, so made, and under such circumstances, cannot be held sufficient to defeat the vendor's claim."

It is to be observed, however, that the case did not present the naked question we are here considering; since the assignee of the bills of lading knew that the assignment was made in contemplation of insolvency, and this, under a recent decision of our supreme court, would have deprived him of the position of a bona fide purchaser without notice. Young v. Keller, 64 Mo. 581.

The question came before the English Court of Appeals, not long afterwards, in the case of Leak v. Scott, 2 Q. B. Div. 376, in which case the doctrine of the case last cited was denied, in an earnest and somewhat heated opinion by the Lord Justice Bramwell, who declared that the decision was "not only a novelty, but a novelty opposed to what may be called the silent authority of all the previous judges and writers who have dealt with the subject." In other words, he inferred that it was the law that one who takes a bill of lading as collateral security merely for an antecedent indebtedness is a purchaser for a valuable consideration, and takes it discharged of the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu—simply because the question had never before been decided in England one way or the other. As in the previous case, it is to be observed with reference to this case, that the record did not present the naked question; for there was a present consideration mingling with the antecedent indebtedness, so that the observations of the court upon the question, notwithstanding the positive terms in which they were couched, were really no more than obiter dicta,—an opinion upon a case not before them.

In the federal courts we find but two direct decisions upon the question. In Lawson v. The Southwestern, 9 Woods, 35, 36, Mr. Justice Bradley at circuit ruled the following proposition: "A transfer of a bill of lading as a mere collateral for previous obligations, without anything advanced, given or lost on the part of the transferee, does not constitute such an assignment as will preclude the vendor of the goods from exercising the right of stoppage in transitu." The contrary was held by Mr. District Judge Nelson, in the Federal Circuit Court in Minnesota, by analogy to the rule laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in Brooklyn City & N. R. Co. v. N. Y. Nat. Bank of the Republic, 102 U. S. 14 (36 L. ed. 61), in respect of commercial paper. St. Paul Roller Mill Co. v. Great Western Dispatch Co. 97 Fed. Rep. 434.

We do not find that the question has been distinctly decided in any of the state courts, except in the case of Leak v. Peters, 63 Ala. 242, 35 Am. Rep. 17, where it was held that the transfer of a bill of lading by the consignee to his prior creditor, as collateral security merely for the prior indebtedness, does not cut off the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu—the creditor of the vendee in such a case not being a bona fide purchaser for value.

In the absence of any direct authority which is controlling upon us, we are thus under the necessity of deciding the question according to the best analogies we can discover in the decisions in this State and in other jurisdictions. There are four analogies which bear directly upon the question: (1) the analogy of goods purchased by means of fraudulent representations, such as will authorize the vendor, on discovering the fraud, to rescind the sale and reclaim the goods; (2) the analogy of conveyances of lands and goods made with the design to hinder, delay or defraud creditors, the purchaser or transferee being innocent of knowledge of the fraudulent design; (3) the analogy of other conveyances of land, subject to unrecorded liens or equities unknown to the transferee; (4) the analogy of the transfer of commercial paper.

First. In respect to the first analogy, it has been unanimously held in the Court of Appeals of New York, in a case twice argued, that one to whom personal property has been delivered by a fraudulent vendor in payment of a precedent debt due him, or (what is tantamount thereto) in performance of an executory contract of sale, made by such fraudulent vendee prior to acquiring possession of the property, or of any symbolical representative of it, is not a bona fide purchaser for value, and cannot hold the property against the original defrauded vendor. Barnard v. Campbell, 65 N. Y. 456; on re argument, 59 N. Y. 73.

It is to be observed that this case follows the analogies of the rulings in that State in respect of commercial paper, considered further on, under which a transfer, even in payment of an antecedent indebtedness, does not divest equities subsisting in favor of the payor, which is not the law in this State. Gram v. Kennedy, 6 Mo. App. 577.

Second. The analogy, in respect of conveyances of lands or goods in fraud of the creditors of the transferor, is illustrated by numerous decisions; and, so far as the writer has observed, they are all to the same general effect, which is that, to entitle the transferee to be treated as a purchaser for a valuable consideration, it must appear that he actually paid the purchase money before he had any notice of the fraud; it is not sufficient that he had agreed to pay it, or even that he had given his check in payment, unless the check had been paid. Arnott v. Hartwig, 70 Mo. 486; Dougherty v. Cooper, 77 Mo. 529; Young v. Kellar, 94 Mo. 581; McNichols v. Rudenka, 18 Mo. App. 615, 522.

The decisions in other jurisdictions to the same effect are so numerous that we refrain from citing them.

Third. In respect of the third analogy, that of other conveyance of land, subject, in the hands of the grantors, to prior unrecorded conveyances, vendors' liens, resulting trusts or other secret equities, our law, in like manner, speaks only in one way. In order to entitle the innocent grantee to protection against a prior unrecorded conveyance, vendor's lien or other equity, he must have parted with something of value as a consideration, before receiving notice of the prior conveyance of equity. Auduchon v. Bender, 44 Mo. 560; Halsey v. Halsey, 8 Mo. 303; Chouteau v. Burlands, 20 Mo. 482; Paul v. Fulton, 25 Mo. 156; Digby v. Jones, 67 Mo. 107.

Professor Pomeroy, in his great work on Equity Jurisprudence, generalizing on this question, says: "A conveyance of real or personal property, as security for an antecedent debt, does not, upon principle, render the transferee a bona fide purchaser, since the creditor parts with no value, surrenders no right, and places himself in no worse legal position than before. The rule has been settled, therefore, in very many of the States, that such a transfer is not made upon a valuable consideration, within the meaning of the doctrine of bona fide purchase." 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 749. To this last statement the learned commentator gives a long list of judicial authorities, pointing out, at the same time, that there are some holdings to the contrary. Since real property has in modern times entered largely into the operations of commerce, it is not perceived why there should be upon such a subject one rule for real property and another rule for personal property; nor is it perceived why there should be one rule for negotiable choses in action and another rule for tangible goods, and while it is desirable that the decisions of the state courts upon questions of commerce, and especially upon questions of commercial paper, should follow those of the federal courts, yet the state judicatories are not bound by the federal judicatories on these questions, and it could easily be pointed out that, on this particular question, so far as it concerns negotiable paper, a majority of the state courts deny the doctrine recently declared in the Supreme Court of the United States in Brooklyn City & N. R. Co. v. N. Y. Nat. Bank of the Republic, supra.

Fourth. Proceeding now to the last and most direct analogy to the question before us, that of the transfer of commercial paper, we regret to find that the question whether the transferee of such paper, who takes it merely as collateral security for an antecedent indebtedness, acquires title to it discharged of prior equities,—is settled differently in different American jurisdictions, and does not seem to be settled at all in this State. The decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Swift v. Tyson, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 1 (10 L. ed. 585), is generally quoted as the leading case in favor of the position that such a taker of negotable paper takes it discharged of equities. That case did not, however, decide the question; since the question in judgment was whether one who thus takes negotiable paper in payment takes it discharged of equities; although there is a dictum of Mr. Justice Story, who gave the judgment of the court, that the rule would be the same in case it were taken as security merely for an antecedent indebtedness. Mr. Justice Catron regarded this dictum as so objectionable that he made it the subject of a special dissent. The question remained undecided in that tribunal as late as the case of Ontes v. Montgomery First Nat. Bank, 100 U. S. 230, 249 (25 L. ed. 561, 384), where it was expressly left as an open question; but soon afterwards, in the case of Brooklyn City & N. R. Co. v. N. Y. Nat. Bank of the Republic, supra, it was resolved in favor of the dictum of Mr. Justice Story, and contrary to the holdings of the courts of New York and many other States.

The opposing line of American authority on this question appear to commence with the leading case of Coddington v. Bay, 20 Johns. 637, where it was held by the highest court of that State, reversing a decision of Chancellor Kent (Bay v. Coddington, 5 Johns. Ch. 64), that one who takes a negotiable instrument merely as collateral security for an antecedent indebtedness due to him from the person indorsing it to him takes it subject to any equities which may exist between the original parties in respect of it. The same court, out of deference to the later decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Swift v. Tyson, supra, again went over the whole ground, reviewing many authorities, and, while conceding the desirability of the state courts following the ruling of the higher federal tribunals on commercial questions, declined to recede from its previous holdings, but re-affirmed the following proposition: An innocent holder of negotiable paper, who has received it in the usual course of trade, for a valuable consideration, though from a person having no title and no authority to transfer it, will be protected, even as against the claim of the previous owner; but if it appear that the paper was received merely as collateral security for an antecedent debt, due from the person who made the unauthorized transfer, and that the transferee neither parted with value on the credit of receiving it, nor relinquished any previous security, he will not be deemed a purchaser for value, and will not acquire a title to the paper as against the real owner. Stalker v. McDonald, 6 Hill, 23, 26.

It would not be profitable, in a judicial opinion, to follow through the rulings of the different States the two divergent lines of authority thus started. We shall limit our inquiry to the law of Missouri and the law of Kentucky.

The initial case in this State is Goodman v. Simonds, 19 Mo. 100. In that case our supreme court had a case before it which, in its judgment, called for a decision of this question. The court, citing the New York decisions above given, and also citing, but not following, Swift v. Tyson, supra, ruled that the transferee of commercial paper as collateral security for an antecedent debt is not a taker for value. In the opinion of the court by Ryland, J., the following strong language occurs: "A man catching at every chance to save himself never inquires, so he can obtain collateral security, about the fairness of the transaction. He gives nothing for it, he risks nothing for it. Then, common sense and common honesty unite in saying he shall take it with the defense the other parties have against it in the hands of the original holder and party. We do not say that a bill of exchange, passed to a person in the payment of a pre-existing debt, would be liable in his hands, without notice, to the equities or defenses of the original parties, but that the holder of a bill merely as collateral security for a pre-existing debt, having given no value for it, no consideration for it, holds it liable to such equities. We know that there are authorities whose phraseology may be construed against this view, but we also know that there are authorities in its favor, and we think reason and justice unite in supporting it." Id. 110.

In a case between the same parties and apparently on the same instrument (though how this came about does not appear) which went from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Missouri to the Supreme Court of the United States (Goodman v. Simonds, 61 U. S. 30 How. 343 [15 L. ed. 904]), the court refrained from deciding this question, being of opinion that it was not presented by the record. The question next came before the Supreme Court of Missouri for decision in Grant v. Kidwell, 30 Mo. 455, and it was ruled, in a short and ill-considered opinion, delivered without referring to the leading authorities on the question, and without making any allusion to Goodman v. Simonds, that the indorsee of a negotiable promissory note assigned before maturity, as an indemnification against an antecedent liability, takes it discharged of prior equities. The question next came before the supreme court in Boatman's Sav. Inst. v. Holland, 38 Mo. 49. The plaintiff had taken the note from the payee as collateral security for an antecedent debt, and was now suing the maker upon it. The maker offered certain evidence for the purpose of showing that the note had been given to the original payee upon a consideration which had failed. It was held that the trial court rightly rejected this evidence. Wagner, J., said: "It was wholly irrelevant, and, had it been introduced, it would not have constituted the shadow of a defense. A pre-existing debt, or an antecedent liability, incurred by an indorsee of a negotiable note assigned before maturity, is a sufficient consideration to support the title of such indorsee." The court cited Swift v. Tyson, supra, and also its previous decision in Grant v. Kidwell, but made no reference to Goodman v. Simonds, supra, although it had been cited in the printed briefs.

If the question rested here, it would be entirely clear that so far as bills of exchange and promissory notes are concerned, the transferee in pledge for an antecedent indebtedness gets as good a title as one who parts with the present value. But these decisions are succeeded by a line of dicta and decision which tend to create the impression that the courts regard the doctrine of Goodman v. Simonds as still the law of this State. The principle of that decision was recognized by the supreme court in Lopen v. Smith, 63 Mo. 455, 456, and in Deere v. Maraden, 68 Mo. 600, 610; by this court in Terry v. Hickman, 1 Mo. App. 119, 124, the court saying that it was "controlling authority;" was acted upon by this court as authority in the decision of Brainard v. Reora, 3 Mo. App. 490, 490—where the court, with singular inconsistency, cited in the same connection Grant v. Kidwell, supra.

Again in Hodge v. Black, 8 Mo. App. 804, there is a dictum that "one who takes a note before maturity, merely as collateral for a pre-existing debt, where the facts are such as to raise no new consideration, is not regarded in Missouri as a holder for value free from all equities between the original parties."—citing Terry v. Hickman, supra. This case was affirmed by the supreme court, adopting the opinion of this court, in 76 Mo. 537.

Again, in Stilling v. Hollman, 73 Mo. 665, 670, the rule in Goodman v. Simonds was recognized by the court in the following language from the opinion by Henry, J.: "Eminent jurists and judicial tribunals hold that one who, for a prior indebtedness, receives a bill of lading for goods, either as collateral security, or in payment of such indebtedness, has no such title as will avail, even against the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu; in other words, that such a one, in such controversy, is not to be regarded as a bona fide purchaser for value (citing cases). And Goodman v. Simonds, 19 Mo. 106, and Lopen v. Smith, 63 Mo. 455, recognize the principle pronounced in the foregoing cases."

The rule in Goodman v. Simonds was again recognized and distinguished in Deere v. Maraden, 68 Mo. 512, the court holding that, where a present consideration, as an agreement express or implied for a delay, however short, supervenes, the rule of that case does not apply. Still later, in Craxford v. Spenser, 93 Mo. 493, 500, our supreme court made a similar ruling, following Deere v. Maraden, supra, and quoting from the decision in Goodman v. Simonds, supra, the latter portion of the passage which we have quoted from it in this opinion. Finally in Fedor v. Abramson, 28 Mo. App. 454, 457, where the question was whether a transfer by a failing debtor to one of his creditors, in payment, makes the transferee a purchaser for value, it was said by Rombauer, J.: "Plaintiff claims that the decision in Deere v. Maraden, 68 Mo. 512, questions the rule stated in Leas v. Clark, 11 Mo. App. 492. This, however, is an obvious mistake. The supreme court in that case simply re-affirmed the proposition, which has been the law of this State since Goodman v. Simonds, 19 Mo. 107, that one who takes collaterals for a pre-existing debt, without any new consideration to support the transfer, is not a purchaser for value of such collaterals." The case which was thus regarded as pronouncing what has ever since been the law of this State was, as I have above shown, twice overruled upon cases in judgment, once thereafter re-affirmed and applied, and nine times thereafter expressly or impliedly recognized as the law. The manner in which our courts have thus dealt with a question of such great importance to the commercial community affords a striking illustration of the imperfect way in which ju dicial work has been done in this State, produced, no doubt, largely by the over-crowded state of the dockets of the courts, and the excessive amount of work thrown upon the individual judges. If the doctrine of stare decisis were strictly adhered to, it would unavoidably result in the conclusion that one who takes negotiable paper as collateral security for an antecedent indebtedness takes it as a purchaser for value; for such was ruled in our supreme court in Boatman's Sav. Inst. v. Holland, 88 Mo. 49, where the question was before the court in judgment, which is the last controlling decision upon the subject. But in view of the manner in which our supreme court has subsequently dealt with the question, I do not think that we are at liberty to hold that it is concluded by that decision. We should rather regard it as still an open question.

If we were to rest our decision upon the analogy of commercial paper and upon the authority of Boatman's Sav. Inst. v. Holland, supra, it would result in a reversal of the judgment of the circuit court in this case; because it would indisputably appear that the plaintiffs became bona fide purchasers for value of the whiskey in controversy, when they received from Conrad the warehouse receipts as collateral security for what he owed them, and especially since the circuit court refused an instruction, tendered by the plaintiffs, asserting this principle. But if we were to take this course, we should place ourselves in the inconsistent position of deciding (perhaps erroneously) the question upon the law of Missouri in one of its controlling aspects, and upon the law of Kentucky in another; for, on the question we are considering, the law of Kentucky is settled that one who takes commercial paper merely as security for an antecedent indebtedness is not a taker for value, but holds it subject to prior equities. Lee v. Smead, 1 Met. (Ky.) 628; May v. Quindy, 3 Bush, 96.

When we considered, in a former portion of this opinion, the question of the validity of these warehouse receipts as creating pledges of the property in favor of the plaintiffs, we found that, under a decision of this court, supported by decisions in other jurisdictions, they were invalid; but we also found that they were valid by the law of Kentucky, which law, however, had not been proved as a fact in the trial court. We therefore found that we could not affirm the judgment on that point, since the question had not been raised in the trial court, and, if it had been there raised, the objection could have been obviated by the plaintiffs putting in evidence the law of Kentucky, by which law, it is agreed, the rights of the parties are governed. Upon the same principle, we must now hold that we cannot reverse the judgment as being against the law of Missouri on the point under consideration (the analogy of commercial paper), since, if we were to take this course, the defendants could, on another trial of the cause, put in evidence the law of Kentucky, which on this subject is contrary to the law of Missouri. We cannot, especially, take this course in the unsettled state of the law of Missouri. If the law of Missouri is that the taker of commercial paper, as collateral security merely, is a purchaser for value, within the rule which protects him against prior equities, and if this is a controlling analogy in dealing with the subject of warehouse receipts, nevertheless, knowing as we do that the law of Kentucky, by which the question in this case is governed, is to the contrary, we should be bound to say that the decision of the court upon this point, if erroneous in the precise state of the record, was a harmless error.

We now have to dispose of an argument of counsel for the plaintiffs, based upon the assumption that we are to follow the analogy of commercial paper in deciding the question under consideration. It is this: That the rule, under which the transfer of commercial paper for an antecedent indebtedness takes it subject to equities applies only in the case of accommodation paper where there is a fraudulent deviation, that is to say, where the paper has been given to the payee for a limited or special purpose, and he has, in fraud of the rights of the maker, transferred it for a different purpose. The courts which take this distinction affirm the rule that an indorsee of a negotiable note made for the accommodation of the indorser, but without restriction as to its use, taking the note in good faith as collateral security for an antecedent debt, and without other consideration, is entitled to the position of a holder for value, and is not affected by the defense of want of consideration set up by the maker. New York City Grocers Bank v. Fenfield, 60 N. Y. 808; Pitts v. Vogelberg, 87 Ohio St. 676; Dunn v. Weston, 71 Mo. 378. See also Friend v. Importers & T. Nat. Bank, 76 N. Y. 833, 14 Am. Law Rep. 486.

The argument is that, as the evidence of the plaintiffs tends to show that Stagg, Hume & Co. conferred upon Conrad an unlimited authority to issue warehouse receipts in respect of the whiskey in the bonded warehouse at Silver Creek, this unrestricted authority necessarily included the right on his part to pledge it for his antecedent debts. We know of no rule of law which requires us to take this view. The most that can be said in favor of this view is that it would be the conclusion of fact to be drawn from other facts, and whether the conclusion ought to be drawn was a question for the trial court, and not for this court. But it is to be observed that the conclusion would, upon the evidence in this record, be in the nature of a violent presumption. There is no evidence whatever in this record that any member of the firm of Stagg, Hume & Co. ever gave or intended to give to Conrad authority to do what was done—to pledge, in contemplation of insolvency, the whiskey which they had made for him on credit, and which remained in their warehouse, to his relatives and friends for his antecedent debts. Suppose that he had solicited authority from them to do this, could anyone for an instant believe that they would have granted it? It is further to be observed that any course of reasoning, which holds that, because they did authorize him to use warehouse receipts merely as a means of transferring title to these goods while in their warehouse in the ordinary course of trade, they are to be held as having authorized him to use them for the destruction of their own legal rights,—is a course of reasoning which would destroy the vendor's lien in every case; because, as we have observed, the very existence of a vendor's lien always assumes that the title to the goods has passed to the vendee, since a man cannot have a lien on his own goods. The vendor has sold the goods to the vendee on credit, marked them, designated them, set them apart and placed them under his dominion and control in such a sense that the title has passed and that there has been an executed sale. What is this but to say to the vendee "Take the goods; they are yours; deal with them as you choose; here is a writing saying that I have sold them to you." But notwithstanding all this, if, while they are yet in the actual possession of the vendor, he were to sell them, or to mortgage them, even in the course of trade, by any process which does not amount to a transfer of the possession of them in theory of the law—on the plainest principles, the vendor's lien would revive upon his insolvency, even as against the sub-vendee. The sub-vendee would stand in the shoes of his vendor and get no higher title than his vendor. Dixon v. Yates, 5 Barn. & Ad. 313; Hamburger v. Redman, 9 Daly, 91; Southwestern F. & C. Press Co. v. Stenard, 44 Mo. 71.

In other words, it is the transfer of possession, and not merely the transfer of title, which cuts off the vendor's lien; and in nearly every case of executed sale the vendor gives the vendee the power of transferring possession, and that was all that was given in this case in the authority to issue warehouse receipts. They were a mere means put into Conrad's hands of delivering constructive possession to others.

Recurring, then, to the analogies in which we have sought for a rule of decision upon the question whether the rights of the plaintiffs as holders of these warehouse receipts are superior to the rights of Stagg, Hume & Co., as unpaid vendors in possession, we find that they are all in favor of the conclusion that the rights of the unpaid vendor are superior, and that the plaintiffs are not to be regarded as purchasers for value, except the one which relates to the assignment of commercial paper, and that, while the law on this subject is unsettled in this State, it is settled in accordance with the other analogies in Kentucky, by the law of which State the rights of the parties are governed. We therefore hold that the plaintiffs are not to be regarded as purchasers for value, and that the vendor's lien of Stagg, Hume & Co., founded on actual possession, took precedence of their constructive possession as pledgees.

In the case already alluded to, which was twice before this court and the supreme court (Stilling v. Rollman, 6 Mo. App. 76, affirmed 73 Mo. 603, S. C. sub nom. Styles v. Rollman, 13 Mo. App. 598, affirmed 85 Mo. 36), the court merely decided that one who takes a bill of lading as collateral security for an antecedent debt gets a better title than one to whom the consignor has subsequently transferred a duplicate exemplification of the same bill of lading in fraud of the rights of the first taker, although the second taker gets actual possession of the property—a principle several times affirmed in the English courts, and a very simple one, for the title of a person to property lawfully acquired is not to be defeated, even in favor of an innocent person, by a subsequent fraud of the transferor, for which the first taker is not responsible. The second taker gets nothing, because his vendor has nothing to transfer. Nemo dat quod non habet. Whistler v. Foster, 14 C. B. N. S. 949.

V. One question remains to be considered. It is strongly urged that, even if we take this view, yet, notwithstanding this, the plaintiffs are entitled to be regarded as having a better right on the principle of estoppel. In our opinion the record does not show a state of facts on which an estoppel can be predicated. The doctrine of equitable estoppel cannot be invoked, unless what was said or done by the party to be estopped can be shown to have influenced the conduct of the other. Edel-george v. Mutual House Bldg. Ass. 60 Mo. 59; Spurlock v. Spruile, 73 Mo. 508; Acton v. Deoley, 74 Mo. 68; Rogers v. Marsh, 78 Mo. 64; Noble v. Blount, 77 Mo. 285.

It must have had the effect of misleading the party asserting the estoppel. Hydraulic Press Brick Co. v. Neumeister, 15 Mo. App. 502.

This one element of an estoppel is nowhere presented by the record in this case. It is not shown—and if it was the fact it was for them to show it—that the plaintiffs altered their position in any way to their disadvantage on account of the representation which Stagg, Hume & Co. may have held out to them, by publishing Conrad as the owner of this warehouse and of the whiskey stored therein, and by allowing him to issue warehouse receipts as such owner. If an estoppel, such as is now claimed, can be built upon a presumption or a surmise, it is easy to see that it would totally destroy the rule, applied in so many situations, as already seen, which places a subsequent purchaser in the shoes of his vendor; for a case can scarcely be imagined—and this must be especially true in cases where commercial paper is transferred as collateral security for antecedent debts—where an attenuated estoppel could not be conjured up to destroy the rule of many jurisdictions which deprives such a transferee of the advantages of a bona fide holder for value.

We have thus endeavored to track this most difficult and complicated case over all the ground outlined by the counsel in their arguments. We are greatly indebted to the counsel on both sides for the aid which their learning, ability and industry have afforded us in arriving at the final solution of the questions presented. We have endeavored to decide the case in accordance with settled rules of property, without throwing into the scale any loose conceptions of justice or equity. We cannot, however, refrain from observing in conclusion that the result at which an adherence to legal principles, as we understand them, enables us to arrive, is in consonance with what seems to be the plain justice of the case. The vendor's lien, like the analogous doctrine of stoppage in transitu, is favored in the law. Muller v. Pender, 55 N. Y. 325, 337; McEwan v. Smith, 2 H. L. Cas 309, 326, per Lord Campbell, Calahan v. Babcock, 31 Ohio St. 291, 8 Am. Rep. 63, 65.

It does not rest upon any strictly logical basis. It has been the outgrowth of a struggle for justice. It is founded in the obvious conception of justice that one man's goods ought not to be applied to the payment of another man's debts. Heins v. Railroad Transfer Co., 82 Mo. 283, 286.

It was, indeed, said by one English judge that "it has always been certain that the owner might retake his goods, on their passage, by any means short of felony, if he had subsequent grounds for believing that the purchaser would not perform his part of the contract by paying for them." Gibbs, Ch. J., in Litt v. Cowley, 1 Holt. N. P. 838, 7 Taunt. 169.

It was in like manner said by a judge who has been regarded as the father of the system of equity jurisprudence, that if the vendor "had got the goods back again by any means, provided he did not steal them, I would not blame him." Lord Hardwicke in Snes v. Prescott, 1 Atk. 245, 250.

And yet, if the present actions had been allowed to be well founded, the very consequence against which the courts of justice have struggled would have taken place in this instance. One man's goods would have been wrested from his actual possession in order to pay another man's debts.

It results from the foregoing that the judgment of the Circuit Court must be affirmed.

Judge Peers concurs.

Judge Rombauer, having been of counsel, did not sit.

It will perhaps be more satisfactory to the parties to state that Judge Lewis, who was a member of the court when the cause was first submitted, after examining the record and the printed arguments, was also in favor of affirming the judgment.

[The Reporter is directed by Judges Thompson and Biggs to state that, pending a motion for rehearing, Judge Biggs succeeded Judge Peers as a member of the court; that the motion was taken under advisement for a considerable time, and all the questions involved in the case were gone over by Judge Biggs as though the case had been newly presented, and that he concurred in overruling the motion, for the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion.]

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

Neal P. MARTIN, Ply. in Err.,

v.

George P. JOHNSON.

(.....Ga.....)

The law of the State in which a note for money loaned is given governs on the question of usury, where it is secured by a deed of land located in the State, and part of the money, representing the usury, was deducted from the loan, and never paid over to the borrower, although the note is expressly made payable in another State.

ERROR to the Superior Court for Muscogee County to review a judgment striking out certain pleas setting up the defense of usury in an action on a promissory note. Reversed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Porter Ingram, J. F. Pou and C. R. Russell for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Barrow & Thomas and L. F. Garrard for defendant in error.

Blandford, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

George P. Johnson brought his action against Neal P. Martin on a promissory note, alleging in his declaration that, to secure the payment of said note, Martin had executed to him a deed conveying certain land lying in the County of Muscogee and State of Georgia, wherefore he prayed a special lien on said land according to the Statute in such cases made and provided, as well as a general judgment against Martin.

The note is dated at Columbus, Ga., April 16, 1887, and payable to the order of Johnson

NOTE.—Contract; law of place governs.

The nature, validity, obligation and interpretation of contracts are to be governed by the lex loci. Hochstadter v. Hays, 11 Colo. 118.

In every forum a contract is governed by the law with a view to which it was made. Pritchard v. Norton, 106 U. S. 124 (27 L. ed. 104); Conframp v. Bunel, 4 U. S. 4 Dall. 419 (1 L. ed. 801); Teal v. Walker, 111 U. S. 212 (28 L. ed. 415).

The general rule that the validity of the contract is to be decided by the law of the place where the contract is to be performed, does not apply to cases involving the rate of interest, where it is stipulated in the contract at the place where the loan is made, in conformity with the law of the place, that a higher rate of interest shall be paid than is allowed by the place of performance, but that the lex loci contractus governs. Cope v. Alden, 37 How. Pr. 186, 63 Barb. 355; Chapman v. Robertson, 8 Paige, 627, 8 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 1128.

A contract valid where it is made is to be held valid everywhere. See notes to Osgood v. Bauder (Iowa) 1 L. R. A. 655; Bacon v. Horne (Pa.) 2 L. R. A. 855.

Under the Usury Laws.

The illegality of usury is wholly a creature of the Legislature, and parties cannot be relieved from contracts providing for exorbitant rates of interest, except as provided by statute. Coleman v. Commins, 77 Cal. 548.

In a contract for the loan of money, the law of the place where the contract is made is to govern as to the rate of interest, although secured by a mortgage on lands in another State, unless some other circumstance shows that the parties had in view the laws of the latter State. De Wolf v. Johnson, 23 U. S. 10 Wheat. 367 (6 L. ed. 843); Jewell v. Wright, 12 Abb. Pr. 59; Pomerooy v. Ainsworth, 22 Barb. 118; Railard v. Webster, 9 Abb. Pr. 404.

The law of the State where the agreement was made and the instrument taken to secure its performance decides the fate of a security taken upon a usurious agreement (Andrews v. Pond, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 65 (10 L. ed. 61); Miller v. Tiffany, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 298 (17 L. ed. 540); Call v. Palmer, 116 U. S. 93 (29 L. ed. 559); unless some other circumstance shows that the parties had in view the laws of the latter State. De Wolf v. Johnson, supra).

These rules are subject to the qualification that the parties act in good faith, and that the form of the transaction is not adopted to disguise its real character. Miller v. Tiffany, supra.

If interest at the place of performance of a contract is higher than that at the place of contract, at the office of the Eastern Banking Company, Boston, Mass. To this action Martin pleaded.

(1) The general issue. (2) That the consideration for which said note sued on was given was largely tainted with usury, and that the sum of $80 of usurious interest was added into, and constituted a part of, the $500 for which said note was given; that he actually received from the plaintiff only $420, and that all the balance was for usurious interest at and above the rate of 8 per cent per annum. And defendant further alleges that one William Redd was at the date of the note the duly authorized agent of the plaintiff to negotiate said loan; that he called on Redd, as such agent, and requested said loan of $500 for the term of five years, and that the said Redd then and there agreed to make said loan, that, for the delay of payment of said sum defendant agreed to give his several notes, as alleged by the plaintiff, at the rate of 8 per cent per annum on the said $500 note, and that then and there the said Redd, as such agent, demanded from defendant, for further interest, and in consideration of delay of payment of said note, the further sum of $80, —to all of which exactions and demands defendant agreed and consented, as the same were the only terms upon which the loan could be had; that he received from the plaintiff's authorized agent the sum of $420 and no more, and thereupon gave his note for $500, and the interest notes, plaintiff receiving also the sum of $80, making in all the sum of $268.83 of interest for the delay of payment of the $420 received by defendant for the term of five years, that by said usurious transaction the plaintiff received the sum of $95.22 of usurious interest over and above the lawful rate of 8 per cent interest, for delay of payment of $420 for five years. And defendant pleaded (3) that the plaintiff could not have or enforce any special lien on said land for said purchase money under said deed made by defendant and set forth by plaintiff, because defendant says said deed is void, and conveys no title, the same being tainted with usury; that as part consideration of said deed, defendant paid to the plaintiff the sum of $95.22 of usurious interest over and above the lawful rate of 8 per cent per annum; and that the same entered into, and formed part of, the consideration of said deed. And (4) defendant alleges that on the 16th day of April, 1887, plaintiff made and delivered to defendant his certain obligation in writing, signed with his hand and seal, whereby he bound himself to reconvey to defendant the land described in said obligation, provided that defendant should pay said $500 note sued on, and also the coupon notes described in plaintiff's declaration, which said obligation in writing made by the plaintiff to defendant recites the particulars of said loan of $500, and recites, further, that the loan was made to bear interest at the rate of 8 per cent per annum, defendant averring that said loan of $500 was to and did bear interest at the rate of 16 per cent per annum, defendant receiving only $420, and $80 of said amount being retained by plaintiff as further interest for the delay of payment of $500 for the term of five years. Defendant alleges that said sum of $80 was exacted and retained by the plaintiff as usurious interest over and above the legal rate of 8 per cent per annum, and therefore the deed made by him conveying said land to the plaintiff was made in consideration of said usurious interest, and is null and void; that all the deeds, obligations and contracts between him and the plaintiff concerning said loan are tainted with usury, and each and all of them are null and void. To all of these pleas, except the first, the plaintiff, by his attorneys, demurred, and moved to strike the same. The demurrer was sustained by the court, and said pleas were stricken.

While we think that these pleas were technically incorrect, and that the second and fourth pleas did not constitute a bar to the action, yet, inasmuch as we are of the opinion that the court committed error in striking the third plea, and as the case will have to go back for another trial, and the plaintiff in error may amend his pleas so as to plead a want of consideration in the note as to $80, or a set-off to that amount, we are induced to express some opinion as to the main point which has been argued before us.

the parties may lawfully stipulate for the higher interest. Ibid., Andrews v. Pond, supra; Payton v. Hietackin, 131 U. S. Append. C1, 30 L. ed. 670; Cookle v. Fleck, 35 U. S. 344 21 L. ed. 940; Cromwell v. Sac County, 36 U. S. 51 34 L. ed. 381).

Where a contract in express terms provides for a rate of interest lawful in one but unlawful in the other State, the parties will be presumed to contract with reference to the laws of the State where the stipulated rate is lawful, and such presumption will prevail until overcome by proof that the stipulation was a shift to impart validity to a contract for a rate of interest in fact usurious. Scott v. Perice, 39 Ohio St. 67, 46 Am. Rep. 422; Fisher v. Olin, 3 Chand. 102; Buttore v. Olin, 11 Iowa, 1; Arnold v. Potter, 22 Iowa, 192; Newman v. Kershaw, 10 Wis. 340; Hosford v. Nichols, 1 Paige, 285, 2 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 624; Townsend v. Riley, 48 N. H. 302; Fanning v. Consequa, 17 Johns, 511, 8 Am. Dec. 442; Pratt v. Adams, 7 Paige, 613, 4 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 302; Richards v. Globe Bank, 12 Wis. 622.

Where the contract was made in New York, its construction and validity depend upon the laws of that State. It must be held to have been made with regard to such laws. Mendo v. St. Louis Mt. L. Ins. Co. 31 How. Pr. 6.

An agreement for the loan of money, made and consummated in this State by residents thereof, by which the borrower is to give a bond accompanied by a mortgage upon lands in Wisconsin, no place of payment being specified, is governed by the Usury Laws of New York, and not those of Wisconsin. Cope v. Alden, 37 How. Pr. 134; McCrahey v. Alden, 45 Barb. 275; Hosford v. Nichols, supra; Hull v. Wheeler, 7 Abb. Pr. 411; Goddard v. Sawyer, 9 Allen, 78.

Where persons residing in New York wrote their acceptance upon a draft, and sent it to Illinois to have it negotiated there, it is an Illinois contract, although made payable in New York, and is not usurious, although bearing interest at a greater rate than is allowed in New York, if the rate is lawful in Illinois. Tilden v. Blair, 30 U. S. 21 Wall. 341 22 L. ed. 622.

Usury in a bond is governed, as a general rule, by the law of the place where payable, although the parties may also stipulate in accordance with the law of the place where the contract is made. Junction R. Co. v. Bank of Ashland, 70 U. S. 12 Wall. 205 20 L. ed. 303.

It is undoubtedly true, as a general rule, that the interest which a contract should bear is to be governed by the law of the place where the same is to be performed. This rule applies to all legal contracts,—legal where the same are executed and made; but where, according to the law of the place whereat the contract is made, it is unlawful to take or to exact usury, or more than a certain per cent of interest provided by law as the legal rate, such contract will in some instances be construed according to the law of that place.

It appears from the pleas which were stricken that the parties to this case entered into an agreement whereby it was agreed that the plaintiff in error, in consideration that the defendant in error would advance and lend to him the sum of $500, would make and deliver to the defendant in error his promissory note for the sum of $500, and that he would secure the payment of said note by executing a deed to certain land located in this State; the defendant in error to reconvey said land to the plaintiff in error upon payment of the $500 note, and the notes given for usury. To carry out this agreement, the defendant in error advanced to the plaintiff in error the sum of $420, retaining $80 out of the $500 for which the note was given, whereupon the plaintiff in error executed the deed set forth in the record. We are clear in the opinion that a part of this contract or agreement was made in this State, and performed in this State. That is to say, the usurious interest, as alleged in the plea, was paid in this State to the defendant in error. We therefore think that this contract was usurious to some extent, and, under the laws of this State, the defendant in error can recover nothing more than the principal sum loaned, with interest thereon at the rate of 8 per cent, all interest in excess of that being usurious, and not recoverable.

The notes given by the plaintiff in error were only a part of the contract, and it is a well-settled question of law that one contract or agreement may be a good consideration to support another. So, as the part of this agreement which is to be performed in Massachusetts is the payment of the notes sued on, when the courts of this State are called upon to enforce this contract the usury which was exacted and retained by the defendant in error may be pleaded to the action.

In the case of Andrews v. Ford, 38 U. S. 19 Pet. 77 (10 L. ed. 60), where a draft which contained usury was made in the State of New York, but payable in the State of Alabama, and which, under the laws of the former State, was declared void, whereas, under the laws of the latter State the usury contained in the same alone was void, and could not be collected, the supreme court held that such contract was to be governed by the laws of the State of New York.

In the case of Holmes v. Manning (Mass.) 19 N. E. Rep. 25, where a note which contained usury was dated at Boston, in the State of Massachusetts, made payable in the State of Massachusetts, but payable to a payee who resided in the State of New York, who was the plaintiff in the case, the court held that the contract was to be governed by the law of New York, and the note was void. See also the case of Manney v. Cushman, 35 Ga. 78.

If this court should hold that a note made in this State, but payable in the State of Massachusetts, for money advanced by the agent of a person who resided in Massachusetts, could be collected notwithstanding it contained 16 per cent usurious and unlawful interest, then the law of this State as to usury would be inoperative and useless. The money lenders of those States which have no usury laws, but which allow to be collected any rate of interest contracted for, could flood this State with their agents, and, by the loan of money, exact the highest rates of interest,—even 100 per cent. The contract of lending and borrowing always includes two agreements,—one, by the lender, to deliver the money; and the other, by the borrower, to repay it. As the plea do not allege that the agreement to deliver the money was to be performed elsewhere, the place of delivery was Georgia. Doimas v. Cook, 14 N. J. Eq. 58; Campion v. Kalia, Id. 210; Andrews v. Torrey, Id. 255.

It was in the performance of this agreement that the usury was reserved. The whole amount of the usury was deducted from the money delivered, and this was done in Georgia. The taint of usury does not result from payment, but from agreement, performed or unperformed. Were payment necessary, the deduction of the usury from the amount of the loan is equivalent to payment, not for the purpose of recovering it back, but for the purpose of affixing the taint, and resisting ultimate payment pro tanto. The note bears no usurious interest, but a part of the principal is usury already reserved in Georgia, by holding back a part of the loan. That part of the note represents money now in the creditor's possession, and which he has never delivered to the borrower. Suppose the note were for that money only, with 8 per cent interest on it. Would it be collectible because payable in Boston? Would it not be a contract to pay in Boston usury which had been reserved in Georgia? Is usury reserved in Georgia by deducting it from the loan, less usury because agreed to be actually paid elsewhere?

The parol agreement out of which the note sued on in this case sprung was made in this State. Part of that agreement was performed in this State. The usury set forth in defendant's plea was paid in this State, and all that was left to be performed of that agreement was the payment of the notes sued on in this State. The maker of these notes resides in this State, and the land which was conveyed as security is located in this State. Whether a contract is made with reference to the place or State or country in which it is to be performed is a question of no easy solution. However this may be, there is enough in this case to show that, in all likelihood, the parties to the contract sued on contemplated the law of the domicile of the maker as the law which should govern this contract in all respects. There is a portion of this contract which under no circumstances could be enforced in the State of Massachusetts,—that as to the land upon which it is sought to set up a lien. Nor can we very readily see how any portion of this contract could be enforced in the State of Massachusetts against a person resident in the State of Georgia. So we think that the second and fourth pleas could be so amended as to be allowed to stand.

As to the third plea, we are satisfied that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer thereto, and striking the same. That plea distinctly alleged that the deed of conveyance was tainted with usury; and this court has frequently held, under our Code, that, wherever a deed is tainted with usury, it is void as a conveyance because the same is illegal. We are satisfied that the striking of this plea was erroneous, and for this reason the judgment of the court below must be reversed.

Judgment reversed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Jacob B. TALLMAN, Rept.,

v.

METROPOLITAN ELEVATED R. CO.
et al.

1. Damages for the permanent diminution in the value of lots caused by an elevated railway in front of them cannot be recovered in an action for damages after construction of the road, but the damages must be limited to the time preceding the action.

2. Damages to lots by construction of an elevated railroad in front of them without compensation to the owner, where he subsequently sues for the damages sustained, are limited to diminished rental or usable value during the time prior to the suit, and must be based on the actual condition of the lots just as they are. What the effect on their value would have been if buildings had been erected thereon, which in fact were not, is immaterial.

All corporate rights and franchises are lost by an elevated railroad company, by a failure to construct the road within the time fixed in its charter or articles of association. Re Kings Co. Elevated R. Co. 41 Hun. 486.

An application for the appointment of commissioners to appraise property may be defeated by proof of the lease or forfeiture of the corporate rights and franchises of the applicant. Ibid.

The failure to locate the columns in the roadway, or their distance from the curb, in streets exceeding forty-two feet in width, does not make the general plan adopted by the commissioners under the Rapid Transit Act defective. Re Kings Co. Elevated R. Co. 112 N. Y. 47.

Appropriation of right of way; damages.

Depriving the owner of a lot, abutting on a public street, of, or materially interfering with, his enjoyment of the easement in the street to its full width for admission of light and air to his lot, is a taking of his property for public use, within the Minnesota Constitution, for which full compensation must be made. Vanderburgh, J., dissent. *Adams v. Mr. James M. Smith, for respondent:

The evidence of the value of the lots and the cost of building such houses as the plaintiff had made plans for building was properly admitted, for the purpose of showing a basis upon which the jury might form an estimate as to the value of the use of the lots, with and without the road, on the ground that it is fair to presume that a reasonably sensible man will do that which is for his interest.

Mathews, Presumptive Ev. p. 8; Starkie, Ev. 2d Am. ed. p. 1240, note c.

Messrs. John E. Parsons, Joseph H. Choate, G. Willett Van Nest, A. P. & W. Man, Burnett & Whitney, Mitchell & Mitchell, and Burrill, Zabriskie & Burrill submitted a brief in support of the judgment, on behalf of certain persons who had recovered judgments in cases where expert testimony was admitted to prove diminished value.

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff was the owner of four adjoining lots on the northerly side of West Fifty-third Street in the City of New York. He became the owner of three of them in 1866, and of the other in 1868, and he continued to own them until after the commencement of this action in February, 1884. The elevated railway of the defendants was constructed through Fifty third Street in front of these lots in 1878, and was thereafter maintained and operated. The plaintiff used a part of his lots for a carpenter shop and the remainder as a lumber yard. This action was commenced to recover damages occasioned to the lots by the construction and operation of the railway, and the only question which it is important for us now to determine relates to the rule of damages.

When the defendant began to construct its railway in front of the plaintiff's lots he could have commenced an action in equity against it and restrained it until it had made compensation to him for the rights and easements which it took from him, or until it acquired them by condemnation proceedings. Story v. New York Elevated R. Co. 90 N. Y. 122.

In that way he would, at least in theory of the law, have been indemnified for all the damages he would suffer by reason of the construction of the railway. Instead of taking his remedy by an equitable action at that time he could have taken it at any time afterward during his ownership of the lots with the same result.

He was not, however, confined to his remedy by such an action. He could suffer the railway to be constructed and then bring successive actions to recover damages to his lots, caused by the construction, maintenance and operation of the railway. In such an action he would recover his damages to the commencement of the action, and the action would be governed by the principles laid down in Utins v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 101 N. Y. 98, 3 Cent. Rep. 116.

In such an action the plaintiff cannot recover for the permanent diminution in the value of his lots. He can only recover the damages he sustains from day to day, or from month to month, or from year to year, in the use of his lots; and the question to be determined in such an action is, How much has the rental or usable value of the lots been diminished by the construction, maintenance and operation of the railway? As a basis for estimating the damages, the lots must be taken as they are used during the time embraced in the action, and the plaintiff's recovery must be confined to the diminished rental or usable value of the lots just as they were. He was in no way pre-occupants disturbed in their sleep, is not an injury for which owners thereof are entitled to compensation, under Pa. Const., art. 16, § 8. Storrett, J., dissent. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Marchant, 18 Cent. Rep. 291, 119 Pa. 441, 21 W. N. C. 300.

Aside from the damages to adjacent buildings and lots, the value to the land owner of the right of way taken for an elevated railroad which is at least thirteen feet above the street, on pillars at least thirty feet apart, must be nominal, or nearly so; but any hindrances caused by the railroad in the use of the property that affect its value are proper matters of consideration in determining the damage. Sullivan v. North Hudson Co. R. Co. (N. J.) Nov. 18, 1882.

An abutting owner is entitled to damages, direct and incidental, occasioned by the construction of an elevated railroad. All such damages are recoverable in a single action. The grantee of a municipality by deed containing covenants protecting a street from any other use than that of a public street is entitled to recover such damages. Lahr v. Metropolitan Elevated R. Co. 3 Cent. Rep. 371, 377, 104 N. Y. 303; American P. M. Society v. Brooklyn Elevated R. Co. 48 Hun, 530.

An elevated railroad and its operation impose upon the street an unauthorized use and is a trespass against abutting owners not duly compensated. Drucker v. Manhattan R. Co. 3 Cent. Rep. 63, 106 N. Y. 137.

The fact that, because a lease of a lot was executed more than six years before the commencement of the action, it is difficult to ascertain the precise amount of damage sustained by the lessee § L. R. A.

in consequence of the construction of an elevated railroad in front of the lot, is no reason for a refusal to award any damage whatever. Hamilton v. Manhattan R. Co. 30 N. Y. 8, 17.

A change in the character of the neighborhood, directly or indirectly attributable to the operation of an elevated railroad, cannot be taken into consideration as causing damages for which plaintiff may recover. Moore v. New York Elevated R. Co. 30 N. Y. 8, 17.

One owning property on a street occupied by an elevated railway has an easement to light from the street, and may maintain an action for damages for any interference with, or interruption of, the light from the street to his property. Pond v. Metropolitan Elevated R. Co. 43 Hun, 567.

Damages for personal injuries.

To maintain an action for injuries to plaintiff's eye by cinders falling from a locomotive of an elevated road, negligence or unskillfulness on the part of the company must be shown. Searles v. Manhattan R. Co. 3 Cent. Rep. 443, 101 N. Y. 601.

Where an elevated railroad company has a right to operate its road over city streets, and to generate steam by the use of coal, any damage necessarily caused by the careful and skillful exercise of its rights can impose no obligation upon it. Ibid.

The lease of its road to another company will not relieve from damages by the construction or operation of the road. Pond v. Metropolitan Elevated R. Co. 43 Hun, 567.

vented from putting his lots to any use he wished. He had the right, acting reasonably, not wantonly or rashly, to put upon them any structures which he deemed most to his advantage, and at any and all times, until the Railway Company acquired as against him the right to maintain and operate its road in Fifty-third Street he had the right to recover the diminished rental value of his lots occasioned to them just as they were by the maintenance and operation of the road. But he could not be permitted to prove or allowed to recover such damages as he might have sustained if he had put his lots to other uses or placed upon them other structures. Such damages would be purely speculative and contingent. The plaintiff had owned these lots for about twelve years before the railway was constructed without making any substantial improvements upon them, and they remained in the same condition down to the commencement of the action. It appears that at some time he made plans for the erection of dwelling houses upon the lots; but whether he ever intended to build, or would have built, the houses, is mere matter of conjecture. Upon the trial he was permitted to prove what it would have cost to erect the dwelling-houses upon the lots, and what they would have rented for after they were constructed, and also to give evidence of the amount for which they would have rented if the railroad had not been constructed; and the jury evidently took this evidence into consideration in fixing the amount of damages which they awarded the plaintiff. There can be no certainty that the plaintiff would ever have erected dwelling houses upon the lots, and there could be no certainty as to the rents which could have been obtained from them, either with or without the railroad in the street, and the defendant was permitted by the rule adopted in the court below to have all the advantages which he could derive from keeping his lots substantially vacant and ready to sell as such, and, at the same time, to have all the advantages, without the investment of any money and without any risk, which he could have derived from their improved condition. He was simply entitled to the damages caused to him in the use of his lots from the defendant's interference with his easements of light, air and access, and such damages are necessarily, and from the very nature of the case, such only as flowed from the interference with such easements during the time covered by the action. If he desired a more ample indemnity for the injury he suffered from the railway in front of his lots, he should, by an equitable action, have compelled the defendant either by agreement with him to pay his damages, or to acquire the right by condemnation proceedings to interfere with and take his easements. Any other rule would open upon the trial in every case like this an inquiry into all the possible uses to which the abutting owner might put his premises, and damages, instead of being awarded upon any certain or probable basis, would rest mainly upon conjecture and speculation. Adequate sanction for these views is found in the following authorities: Green v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 13 Abb. N. C. 134; Ostrick v. Swinburne, 106 N. Y. 508, 8 Ont. Rep. 701; Wheelock v. Noonan, 108 N. S. L. R. A.

Y. 179, 10 Cent. Rep. 519; Batfield v. Central R. Co. 33 N. J. L. 251; Dorian v. East Brandywine & W. R. Co. 48 Pa. 520.

The rule of damages as thus laid down was violated by many rulings upon the trial of this action, and a new trial must, therefore, be ordered, costs to abide the event.

All concur.

MUSICAL MUTUAL PROTECTIVE UNION, Appt.

(....N. Y....)

1. Courts do not sit for the purpose of determining speculative and abstract questions of law, or laying down rules for the future conduct of individuals in their business and social relations; but are confined in their judicial action to real controversies wherein legal rights of parties are necessarily involved, and can be conclusively determined.
2. Equity will not entertain jurisdiction of cases where there is an adequate remedy at law, or grant relief, unless for the purpose of preventing serious and irreparable injury.
3. Embarrassment in business resulting to a person by reason of non-membership in a protective union and arising from the refusal of those engaged in or connected with a similar business to deal with or work for him, although influenced by obligations voluntarily assumed by such persons in becoming members of the union, or by representations made to them by individual members thereof, gives no right of action to the person embarrassed against either the union or the individuals so influenced.
4. An adjudication cannot be obtained in advance as to the validity of the by-laws of an incorporated association on an application for injunction by a member who has been cited to show cause why he should not be punished for violating such by-laws, unless such punishment would subject him to irreparable injury, and other adequate means of redress are not open to him.
5. Where the imposition of fines, payment of which the corporation has no means of enforcing except through the courts, is the only punishment provided for violation of by-laws, a party cited for trial under such by-laws has no right to an injunction restraining such action, since his remedy at law is sufficient.
6. The possibility that a person may be expelled from an incorporated association in case of his neglect to pay fines if they should be imposed upon him, where no intention to expel him is shown, is not sufficient to warrant an injunction against proceeding to try him for alleged violation of the by-laws making him liable to fines.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Moore. Horatio C. King and George A. Clement, for appellant:

The fundamental principle which underlies this case is that the by-laws in question, in their legal operative force, regulate the matter of association as between the members only; they do not purport to interfere with freedom of action outside of the organization. Such an agreement is not inconsistent with or contrary to any existing law.

As no inconsistent law is shown, the exercise of the power in passing the by-laws in question was discretionary, conclusive and lawful.

Where the exercise of power is intrusted to the judgment and discretion of a particular body of individuals, no court should interfere with or control that discretion, provided it is exercised in good faith.

Ruger, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The remedy afforded for the restraint and punishment of corporations for illegal conduct in the exercise of privileges or franchises not conferred upon them by law is through an action by the attorney-general to suspend their functions or annul their charters. Code Civ. Proc. § 1706.

Individuals who by unlawful combinations seek to interfere with the trade, business or occupation of others, with a view of injuring or embarrassing them in the prosecution of such trade or business, are subject to the penalties of the criminal law and become liable to criminal prosecution on behalf of the people. Penal Code, § 168.

These are the only modes of redress open to parties, generally, for injuries occasioned to them through the voluntary combination of others engaged in similar employments, with a view of influencing and controlling the general conduct and management of such trade and employment. Of course actions may be maintained by individual members of a corporation against it, who have been injured in their property rights by the unlawful action of such corporation, for the purpose of redressing such injuries. Aside from actions of this character, the members of corporations generally cannot law of the land. Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 404; Kent v. Quicksilver Min. Co. 78 N. Y. 128.

Any attempt on the part of an association by its by-laws to deprive a non-consenting member of a right secured to him by the corporate articles is in excess of corporate authority, and ultra vires. Ang. & A. Corp. § 245; Diligent Fire Co. v. Com. 73 Pa. 321; Bergman v. St. Paul Mut. Bldg. Assn. 29 Minn. 273; People v. Young Men's F. M. T. A. Benev. Society, 41 Mich. 67; Presbyterian Mut. Assur. Fund v. Allen, 4 West. Rep. 712, 106 Ind. 302; Baub v. Masonic Mut. Relief Assn. 3 Mackey, 68.

Where the association is a voluntary association, the court has no power, in most instances, to pass upon the question as to whether its rules and regulations adopted for the guidance of its affairs are reasonable or unreasonable. Hyde v. Woods, 3 Sawy. 655; Fritz v. Muck, 68 How. Fr. 76; White v. Brownell, 3 Daly, 388.

maintain actions against corporate bodies for the purpose of influencing or controlling their corporate action. However desirable it may be for the members of financial, industrial and social organizations to be acquainted with the legal force and effect of rules and by-laws, adopted by such societies for the purpose of regulating the conduct and action of its members, it furnishes no reason why courts should entertain jurisdiction of actions, either legal or equitable, brought for the mere purpose of obtaining such information, whether they be instituted in behalf of the member bringing the action alone, or in that of all the associates in the corporation. It is only when some injury has been inflicted on the person, or some right of property has been invaded, destroyed or prejudiced by the action of such corporation, that a member is entitled to maintain an action in the courts for redress or protection. Courts do not sit for the purpose of determining speculative and abstract questions of law, or laying down rules for the future conduct of individuals in their business and social relations; but are confined in their judicial action to real controversies wherein the legal rights of parties are necessarily involved and can be conclusively determined. Bigelow v. Hartford Bridge Co. 14 Conn. 545.

It is said in that case: "It is obviously not fit that the power of the court should be invoked in this form for every theoretical or speculative violation of one's rights."

Legal actions are designed to afford redress for injuries already inflicted and rights of persons or property actually invaded. Equitable actions, however, are not only remedial in their nature, but may also be brought for the purpose of restraining the infliction of contemplated wrongs or injuries and the prevention of threatened illegal action, which may be the occasion of serious injury to others. The creation of equity jurisdiction arose out of the inability of courts of law, through the inflexibility of their rules and want of power to adapt judgments to the special circumstances of cases, to reach and do complete justice in all cases. It is therefore a cardinal rule of equity that it will not entertain jurisdiction of cases where there is an adequate remedy at law, or grant relief, unless for the purpose of preventing serious and irreparable injury. McHenry v. Jewett, 90 N. Y. 58; People v. Canal Board, 55 N. Y. 304.

These principles are elementary and lie at the foundation of all equitable jurisdiction. Equity therefore interferes in the transactions of men by preventive measures only when irreparable injury is threatened and the law does not afford an adequate remedy for the contemplated wrong.

As was said by Judge Andrews in McHenry v. Jewett, 90 N. Y. 62, "It is not sufficient to authorize the remedy by injunction, that a violation of a naked legal right of property is threatened. There must be some special ground of jurisdiction, and where an injunction is the final relief sought, facts which entitle the plaintiff to this remedy must be averred in the complaint and established on the hearing."

We think the judgments of the courts below in this case have proceeded in disregard of the elementary rules referred to. We have looked in vain through the findings of the trial court and the evidence given, to discover any grounds, aside from the alleged invalidity of the by-laws, to which the equitable jurisdiction asserted can be referred. A condition of things is indeed indicated by the findings, from which it may be inferred that the plaintiff will be embarrassed in the conduct of his business on account of non-membership in the Union through the action of some of his employes and artists in withdrawing from his employment. Embarrassments in business, however, which arise from the action of those engaged in or connected with a similar business, although influenced by obligations assumed by them voluntarily in becoming members of societies, or by representations made to them by individual members of such organizations generally, give no right of action to persons so embarrassed either against the societies or the individuals so influenced. The action of the employes referred to is not shown to be the consequence of the threatened proceedings against the plaintiff, or to be dictated by any other influence than that of a voluntary determination by them adopted in reference to the management and control of their own business interest.

A brief reference to the undisputed facts in the case shows that the plaintiff's anticipation of injury from the defendant's action is conjectural and based upon insufficient grounds. The defendant was a corporation organized for the general purpose of cultivating "the art of music in all its branches, and the promotion of good feeling and friendly intercourse among the members of the profession and the relief of such of their members as shall be unfortunate." They had power to make and establish by-laws, rules and regulations, not inconsistent with any existing law, as they shall judge proper, and, among other things, to impose, remit and reduce fines, and to suspend or expel "such members as shall refuse or neglect to comply with the said by-laws and regulations." Laws 1864, chap. 108; Laws 1878, chap. 821.

The plaintiff, being a member of such corporation, brought this action to restrain the defendant from enforcing against him certain by-laws of the corporation. The action, confessedly, is based upon the rights given to him as a member of the corporation, and he thereby seeks to retain his membership while endeavoring to exempt himself from the obligations of the rules and by-laws which he voluntarily assumed in joining the society. His complaint is founded upon the theory that certain by-laws are invalid and contrary to law, and he seeks to have them declared void, as he alleges, for his own protection and in the general interests of the corporation. The only by-laws legally involved in the action read as follows:

Art. 3, § 1: "It shall be the duty of every member to refuse to perform in any orchestra or band in which any person or persons are engaged who are not members in good standing, excepting organists and directors of musical societies and members of traveling companies, and, with such, for no longer a period than four weeks, and any member who shall have violated this section shall be deemed to have committed a breach of good faith and fair dealing between the members of this society, and shall be punished according to § 3 of art. 11."

That section provides that an offender "shall, after a fair and impartial investigation by the board of directors, if found guilty, be fined for the first offense $10; for the second offense $30, and for the third offense, be expelled by the board of directors."

The plaintiff was the director of a musical society and a member of a traveling company, and therefore exempt from the operation of the by-law, at least, for a limited time. He was served November 9, 1885, with a notice of which the following is a copy, viz.:

New York November 9, 1885.

Sir,—You are requested to attend a meeting of the board of directors, to be held at Turn Hall, 66 East Fourth Street, New York, on Friday, the 13th inst., at 10 o'clock, A. M., to show cause why you should not be fined for two violations of § 1, article 3, of the by laws, November 3 and 5.

By order,
M. Papet,
Secretary.

This notice constitutes the only legal evidence of any intended action by the corporation. This suit was commenced on the 10th day of November, 1885, and demands judgment that said by-laws be declared illegal and void, and that said board of directors may be perpetually enjoined and restrained from enforcing the same against the said plaintiff, and against the members of his orchestral company, who are also members of the said defendant Union.

We do not deem it necessary to consider the question of the validity of the by-laws, as they are not necessarily involved in the determination of the action. We are met, in limine, by the objection, on the part of the defendant, that no case has been made bringing the action within settled principles controlling courts in the exercise of their equitable jurisdiction over litigants, and there seems to be no answer to the objection. It is not claimed but that the directors were proceeding, in strict accordance with the powers conferred upon them by the by-laws of the corporation, to investigate and determine the questions whether the plaintiff had been guilty of the offense charged, and, if so, the punishment which should be imposed for the offense. So far as the contract rights of the plaintiff are concerned, he admits the jurisdiction of the board of directors, under their charter and by-laws, to try and determine the charge made against him; but claims that he may, in advance of any action on their part, procure an adjudication by the court as to the validity of the by-laws. As we have heretofore seen, he may raise this question, provided its enforcement subjects him to irreparable injury, and other adequate means of redress are not open to him; but in such event only.

threatened; and we think this claim is well founded. It becomes necessary, therefore, to see just what it is the corporation proposed to do to the plaintiff. The evidence of the contemplated action is undisputed, and consists solely of the proceedings indicated by the letter summoning the plaintiff for trial before the board of directors, as was found by the trial court. He is thereby notified of an intention to try him for two offenses only: the extreme penalty of which, if found guilty, is the imposition of fines, amounting in the aggregate to $30. This is the extent of the offending proved on the part of the corporation against the plaintiff. There is no question raised, either on the proof or findings, as to the expulsion of the plaintiff from the organization, or any question which looks beyond the exaction of the fines imposed.

If, therefore, the plaintiff is to be injured at all by the action of the corporation it is by the requirement to pay these fines. How is he injured by their imposition? No process is provided by which the corporation can collect them, and their payment, if made at all, must necessarily be by the voluntary action of the plaintiff. If their collection is attempted by legal proceedings, the plaintiff has the same defense to an action therefor that he now seeks to use in restraining this action. It may be claimed that his neglect to pay the fines subjects him to expulsion from the corporation; but it is sufficient to say that the proof does not show any intent by the corporation to expel him, and he is entitled to resort to the remedy by injunction only when the necessity for it clearly appears. The plaintiff voluntarily became a member of the defendant society under a pledge to obey its rules and regulations, and so long as he voluntarily continues such member is bound by them, unless he is subjected to some legal injury for which he has no other redress but an action. It affords him no legal ground of complaint against the corporation that others are members thereof and voluntarily obey its rules and regulations, although such action requires them to refuse, under certain conditions, to transact business with the plaintiff.

We are therefore of the opinion that the only relief which could, under any circumstances, be granted to the plaintiff in this action being a judgment restraining the defendant from prosecuting its charges for violation of by-laws, and as this involves the imposition of a penalty only which the corporation has no means of enforcing, no ground for equitable relief has been established.

It also appears, in addition to the absence of any serious injury to the plaintiff's rights which might follow the infliction of the penalties, that he has not availed himself of the means afforded by the rules of the organization to avoid them. He could have urged the invalidity of the by-laws; his ignorance of them; his exemption therefrom, as the manager of an orchestra, in defense of the charge, or in palliation thereof, and the directors had power to acquit him and remit or reduce the fines. Without waiting to see what the action of the board might be, he assumes that he will be found guilty, his defense disregarded, his excuses ignored, and that the punishment will be inflicted. The case is quite barren of evidence tending to show that any injury is reasonably likely to happen to him. We have not been referred to any authorities holding that an action in equity will be sustained under such circumstances. Even in the case of offenses involving the penalty of expulsion from similar societies, actions have been maintained to enjoin such societies from denying the privileges of membership to a party expelled, only after action by the society expelling such members has been had. No case has been cited where an injunction has been granted in anticipation of such an event, and we think, within settled rules, that suit in equity for such a purpose is not maintainable. Hurst v. New York Produce Exchange, 100 N. Y. 605, 1 Cent. Rep.

We practically held in the Hurst Case, that the remedy by injunction could not lie, as no violation of plaintiff's rights had happened, or may ever happen, and no injury thereto is threatened in such a sense as justifies a preventive remedy, and the rule there adopted must govern this case.

The judgments of the courts below should be reversed and a new trial ordered, with costs to abide the event.

(March 4, 1899.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Tarrant County in favor of plaintiff in an action to enjoin defendant from constructing its road along and upon a right of way granted to another company without making compensation to plaintiff. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.
Mr. N. A. Stedman for appellant.

NOTE.—Grant of right of way to railroad; interest acquired.

A railroad company taking land for its right of way is not the absolute owner of the land taken, but takes and holds the right to occupy it for certain purposes. Trowbridge v. Brookline, 3 New Eng. Rep. 791, 144 Mass. 139.

There is no legal presumption that its occupancy extends to the full legal limit. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Obert, 1 Cent. Rep. 884, 109 Pa. 198.

The grant to a railroad of a right of way conveys to it a mere easement and nothing more. Vermilya v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 66 Iowa, 611.

And where it conveys the right of way "for all purposes connected with the construction, use and occupation of said railway," it limits the grant to that railway and its purposes alone. Id. 607.

A railroad company has no power or right to grant an easement even of a foot-way along or by the side of its tracks, and no prescriptive right or presumption of such grant can be asserted. Sapp v. North. Cent. R. Co. 51 Md. 115.

While mere nonuser will not defeat or impair the location of a railroad (Barlow v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 29 Iowa, 276; Noll v. Dubuque, B. & M. R. Co. 22 Iowa, 66; Hestonville, M. & F. Pass. R. Co. v. Philadelphia, 89 Pa. 210), yet it may be defeated by permitting another company to take land and actually construct its road thereon. Chesapeake & O. Canal Co. v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 4 Gill & J. 1; Ooe v. New Jersey M. R. Co. 28 N. J. Eq. 100.

A parcel license granted by the company to another corporation to pass over the location of its road, or to otherwise use it, is revocable at any time. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Godfrey, 71 Ill. 500; 5 L. R. A.

Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Jones, 60 Pa. 417; Heyl v. Philadelphia, W. & R. R. Co. 51 Pa. 469.

A railroad company should have such sole and exclusive control of the land within the lines of its road as shall enable it so to keep it as to exclude all probability of any accident resulting from any outside interference with such possession. Hayden v. Skillings, 3 New Eng. Rep. 176, 78 Me. 418.

The mere right of way of a railroad corporation cannot be sold, even on execution, to one who does not own the franchise. East Alabama R. Co. v. Doe, 114 U. S. 840 (29 L. ed. 136).

A railroad company cannot so lease or transfer its interest under its franchise as to rid itself of liability to the owner of land from which it has a right of way, for the improper use of it. Backus v. Detroit, W. T. & J. R. Co. 71 Mich. 645.

A railroad company cannot transfer to an individual or a firm its franchise as a common carrier over a part of its route, with a view and for the purpose of enabling the grantee to operate the road thereon as private property and exclusively for the purpose of his private business. Fanning v. Osborne, 3 Cent. Rep. 453, 103 N. Y. 441.

The Texas & Pacific Railroad Company, under the Act of Congress of March 3, 1871, and the Supplementary Act of May 2, 1872, had no power to transfer its own land grant, road and franchises, or a section thereof, to another corporation. The power to make such a sale was not included in the power given to issue construction and land bonds, and execute mortgages to secure them, on the land grant and other lands the company might acquire. Southern Pac. R. Co. v. Esquibel (N. M.) 5 R. R. & Corp. L. J. 256.

Mrs. John D. Templeton and Hyde Jennings, for appellee:

A grant of right of way to a railroad or its successors confers no authority on such railroad to convey any part of said right of way except to the purchasers of its franchises, etc.

East Alabama R. Co. v. Doe, 114 U. S. 840 (20 L. ed. 136); Platt v. Pennsylvania Co. 1 West. Rep. 11, 48 Ohio St. 224, 23 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 120; Sapp v. Northern Cent. R. Co. 51 Md. 51, Internal & G. N. R. Co. v. Smith Co. 65 Tex. 31.

The deed of right of way from appellee to the Texas & Pacific Railway Company conveyed nothing but an easement without profit to the Texas & Pacific Railway, and the construction of any other railroad thereon would be an additional burden for which the grantor would be entitled to damages.

Platt v. Pennsylvania Co. supra; Texas & Pacific R. Co. v. Durratt, 57 Tex. 48, Southern Pac. R. Co. v. Reed, 41 Cal. 250, Vermilya v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 66 Iowa, 608, 55 Am. Rep. 379; Tait v. Port Royal & A. R. Co. 20 S. C. 388; New Jersey Zinc & Iron Co. v. Morris Canal & Bty. Co. 1 L. R. A. 133, 44 N. J. Eq. 398; Imley v. Union Branch R. Co. 26 Conn. 249; Pierce, R. R. 260, 496, 497.

If said Fort Worth & Rio Grande Railroad had been constructed over said Texas & Pacific right of way it would have been a taking of or damage to plaintiff's land, and she had the right to restrain it by injunction without alleging in her petition that appellant was insolvent or that her damages would be irreparable.

Plaintiff is entitled to damage by reason of the construction of defendant's railroad across a street or streets on which plaintiff's lots abut, although such lots may be remote from such crossing.

Collard, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The conveyance of plaintiff to the Texas & Pacific Railway Company of a right of way through her land to the City of Fort Worth vested in the company a perpetual easement for the purposes of right of way for its road. Pierce, Railroads, 120.

The fee was not conveyed, but remained in the vendor. This company, having constructed its road on the right of way designated, and operating the same, transferred a part of its right of way, between its track and adjacent lots, to appellant, the Fort Worth & Rio Grande Railway Company; and the latter Company has taken steps to build its road on this strip without compensation to Mrs. Jennings, whose adjacent lots will be injured or damaged by depreciation in value, if the road is built. Can this be done? The direct question has not been decided in this State; but kindred questions have been decided and discussed by 3 L. R. A.

the supreme court, a brief review of which will greatly aid us in deciding the question before us.

In the case of Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Odum, 68 Tex. 953, Justice Gould, delivering the opinion, says: "The use of a street by a railroad, however, is not ordinarily inconsistent with its continued use for the common purpose of a street. The authorities are numerous and conclusive that such an addition to the uses of a street, the fee being in the public, if authorized by the Legislature, gives the lot owner no right to compensation, although his easement in the street be thereby partially impaired and his lots rendered less valuable. The regulation or enlargement of the use of the street—the property of the State—by the Legislature is not a taking of property, within the meaning of the Constitution of 1869, although the lot owner may thereby suffer incidental or consequential inconvenience or injury."

The Constitution of 1869 provided that "no person's property shall be taken or applied to public use without just compensation being made, unless by the consent of such person." Const. 1869, art. 1, § 14; 2 Paschal, Dig. 1101.

The owner's rights in property are better guarded under the Constitution of 1876. It declares that "no person's property shall be taken, damaged or destroyed for, or applied to, public use without adequate compensation being made, unless by consent of such person." Const. 1876, art. 1, § 17.

Constructing this language, it has been held that the term "property" as here used, means "not only the tangible thing owned, but also every right which accompanies ownership, and is its incident," and that, where the construction of a railroad inflicts an injury to such property not common to all other property in the same community by reason of the general fact of the existence of the railway, then such property may be said to be damaged, for which there must be compensation to the owner. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Fuller, 63 Tex. 467.

The court affirmed a judgment for damages in favor of the owner of lots and improvements on a street in which, by legislative authority, a railway company had built its road.

In another later case, decided at the Galveston Term, 1880, Justice Gaines, commenting upon the language of the Constitution, says: "Under the provisions of other Constitutions, which merely provided compensation to the owner for property taken for public use, it had been a question whether or not one whose property was immediately and directly damaged by a public improvement, though no part of it was appropriated, could recover for such damages. . . . The insertion of the words 'damaged or destroyed' in the section [of the Constitution] quoted was doubtless intended to obviate this question, and to afford protection to the owner of property by allowing him compensation when, by the construction of a public work, his property was directly damaged or destroyed, although no part of it was actually appropriated." Trinity & S. W. R. Co. v. Meadows, 73 Tex. 84.

It will now be seen that it is the law of this State that there need be no taking or actual appropriation of property to entitle the owner to damages on account of the construction of a railroad, or other public works adjacent thereto, but that it is sufficient if the property be thereby directly and specially damaged,—depreciated in value,—as a result not common to all such property in the same community, and it will also be seen that, where land has once been dedicated to the public as a highway, it cannot, even upon authority of the Legislature, be appropriated to other public uses, so as to impose additional burdens upon other adjacent property, without adequate compensation to the owner. Wood, Railway Law, 731 et seq.; Pierce, Railroads, 239.

The rights acquired by condemnation of land for public purposes are similar to those ordinarily acquired by contract, unless otherwise stipulated in the deed. Mills, Em. Dom. §§ 110, 111; Pierce, Railroads, 133.

The use of a street for a horse-car railway is not deemed a different use from that intended in its original dedication as a street. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Rosedale St. R. Co. 64 Tex. 80.

The appellant contends, in this case, that a transfer of a part of its right of way by the Texas & Pacific Railway Company to the appellant did not contemplate a use different from that intended in the deed conveying to it the right of way, and consequently there could be no additional burden upon plaintiff's land by the building and running of defendant's road thereon. We cannot agree to this proposition. The deed of the right of way was to the Texas & Pacific Railway Company, granting it the right to use the same perpetually in operating its road. There is no doubt that a legal sale of the franchise and road would carry everything appurtenant thereto,—the right of way as well as the right to operate the road, and take tolls for freight and passengers, but it may be doubted that it can sever a part of the easement—an incident of the franchise—from the franchise itself, and convey the same to another company.

It has been held by the Supreme Court of the United States that "the right of way could not be sold, on execution or otherwise, to a purchaser who did not own the franchise." East Alabama R. Co. v. Doe, 114 U. S. 341 [29 L. ed. 137].

The same doctrine is maintained in Ohio. Platt v. Pennsylvania Co. 43 Ohio St. 228, 1 West Rep 11, 23 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 1:9.

But, where one company sold its entire right of way to another authorized to build and maintain a road between the same points, it was held that the owner of the fee was not injured or affected by the transfer, and that he could not call in question the capacity of the one company to sell, nor the other to purchase. Orelley v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 30 Minn. 341.

A railway company pledged its road and appurtenances to the State. The road was sold to satisfy the pledge, and Lane purchased one section of the road. Without deciding whether his purchase included any of the corporate franchises in conjunction with other purchases, it was held that a sale by him to the Junction Company passed title to the right of way, provided it constructed the road as required by the first corporation. Junction R. Co. v. Ruggles, 7 Ohio St. 1.

Where depot grounds were deeded to a railway company, and, under sanction of the Legislature, the property became vested in another company, it was held that the conditions of the original sale, to the use of the first company, were not violated. Southard v. New Jersey Cent. R. Co. 26 N. J. L. 13.

A railway company made an assignment of its road and effects, which was adjudged valid by the courts. It was held that purchasers at the trustee's sale, who afterwards incorporated, acquired all rights of the old company under deed to the right of way. Pollard v. Madison, 20 Ala. 331.

It has been held that the interest in land acquired by deed to the right of way, within the designated route, may be transferred to another railroad company, into which the original shall merge or consolidate with others by legislative authority. New Jersey M. R. Co. v. VanSyckle, 37 N. J. L. 496; Pierce, Railroads, 130, 133, 135, 496, 497.

The foregoing four cases are cited in Pierce on Railroads in support of the doctrine as stated in the text, "that a railway company . . . may convey, under authority of law, to another corporation, the interest in land which it has acquired by purchase for a right of way, to be used by the purchaser for the same purpose." And we find that none of the cases support the proposition that a railway company can sell a part of its right of way to another company, so as to enable both companies to build and operate two roads on the same right of way. These authorities only go to the extent of holding that, where there is a legal sale of the road, its corporate rights, or when there is a merger of roads, or where one road is abandoned, and another company is authorized to construct the road on the same line, the right of way may pass by sale.

It may not be necessary, in the case before us, to decide whether a railway company owning the right of way may or may not, with the consent of all interested parties, sell a part of it without at the same time conveying its franchise. It may be only necessary for us to inquire if this can be done without the consent of adjoining land owners, without compensation, by purchase or condemnation, where their lands are damaged specially, and not in common with the general public. Appellant cites the case of Hatch v. Cincinnati & I. R. Co., 18 Ohio St. 118, as sustaining its right to take the strip conveyed to it by the Texas & Pacific Railway Company, and construct its road thereon, without compensation to plaintiff for additional damages to her land. The land of plaintiff, in the case cited, was appropriated, under the right of eminent domain, for the purposes of a canal. The canal was made, and used for many years. A railway company, by amicable agreement, had the canal company's interest in the right of way condemned for its use as a railway without the consent of, or compensation to, the owner of adjoining land. The canal was abandoned, and the railroad constructed on the line. It was held that the easement was not abandoned by the canal company to the extent that it reverted to the original owner of the land; but it was also held that the owner was entitled "to recover the value of lands taken, not formerly taken by the original condemnation, and also a fair compensation for additional burdens and inconveniences, not common to the general public, as accrued to him, and his entire tract on which the easement was imposed, by reason of the change of uses." We do not see in what respect this case supports the position of appellant; but, if it is supposed to do so, it was overruled in the later case of Platt v. Pennsylvania Co., decided in 1885 by the same court, which is a case almost exactly in point with the one now under consideration. The Lake Shore Railroad Company had appropriated by condemnation a strip of ground 100 feet wide by 1,800 feet in length, and constructed its road on the western half, along which the road was operated. For a consideration of $7,500, the company agreed with another railroad corporation to let it have twenty-five feet wide of the unused half upon which to construct and operate another road, and to so hold the same in perpetuity. The second road was built and operated on the surplus twenty-five feet, but no consideration was paid to the original owner, whose lot was thereby damaged. It was held that the land owner, by the first appropriation (where more land was appropriated than was necessary, an easement, and not a fee, having passed), could not be subjected to the occupancy and burden upon such surplus of another common carrier. It was also held that the original owner could not have recovered the surplus from the first company, but had the right, after its sale, to treat it as abandoned by the first company for its own uses, and that he was entitled to damages as upon an appropriation by the second company. It was also noted by the court that this holding was not in conflict with the recognized right of a railway company to sell or lease its road with its franchise. 48 Ohio St. 228, 1 West. Rep. 11, 28 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 129.

The court also declared that plaintiff's case was supported by the cases of Junction R. Co. v. Ruggles and Hatch v. Cincinnati & I. R. Co. There was a dissenting opinion, holding that there was no change in the use of the easement, and therefore no additional servitude upon the owner's land; but we think the reasoning of the majority of the court is conclusive and just. It cannot be doubted that a right of way to one railroad is less onerous than when the same is granted to two, and it must be held that a grant of way to one does not authorize it to operate its road, and to convey a portion of the unused way to another company for the same purpose, without the consent of the owner of adjacent land damaged thereby, and without compensation to him for the damage so caused.

We think injunction to restrain the building of the road by defendant until the plaintiff was compensated, or until the way was properly appropriated under the law, was the proper remedy. Pierce, R. Roads, 167, 168, 230.

Appellant contends that the court "erred in overruling its general demurrer to plaintiff's petition, because so much of said petition as alleges damage on account of the contemplated construction and operation of defendant's railway across Hill, Ochiltree, Ballinger and Center Streets, to property not abutting on the right of way of the Texas & Pacific Railway Company, sets up a claim for damages too remote to furnish a basis for an action; and the injury, if any, is not special to plaintiff." If there was error in this part of plaintiff's petition, it being good in other respects, a general demurrer would not reach the defect.

The judgment of the court restrained defendant from building its road on the part of the Texas & Pacific Railway Company's right of way running through any portion of blocks 12, 13, 25 and 29 of Jennings' South Addition to the City of Fort Worth, and also that portion of the right of way occupying Hill and Center Streets, at the intersection of said streets, between the center of said railway track and said block 29. The judgment awards and fixes no damages, but prohibits the building of the road without the consent of the plaintiff, his heirs or assigns, first had and obtained, or without proper appropriation of the same under the laws of the State. Hill and Center Streets intersect at the corner of block 29, where the right of way cuts off a corner of the block. The block abuts on the side of the right of way on which defendant proposes to build its road. We cannot say that there would be no damage to plaintiff by the construction of the road at this point, so causing additional obstruction in these streets. The question of the amount of damage must be settled by the parties, if they consent, or in the proceedings of condemnation, if defendant resort to that method of appropriation, as allowed by the judgment. Our conclusion is, the judgment of the court ought to be affirmed.

James T. FLAHERTY

v.

Michael MORAN, Appt.

(.....Mich.....)

A fence erected maliciously, and with no other purpose than to shut out the light and air from a neighbor's window, is a nuisance.

(May 16, 1901.)

APPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Kent County in favor of complainant in a suit brought to enjoin the maintenance of a certain fence. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Mr. L. E. Carroll for defendant, appellant.

Messrs. Thompson & Temple for complainant, appellee.

Long, J., delivered the opinion of the court: The parties to this cause own adjoining lots in the City of Grand Rapids, complainant's lot being on the northwest corner of Goodrich and Lagrange Streets, and the defendant's lot adjoining it on the north, both extending westerly to an alley in the rear. The line of the lots was established before either of the parties purchased. The defendant built a house some years ago near the north line of his lot, and standing back some distance from the street. He occupies this property as his home. In August, 1888, the complainant commenced the erection of a house on the front end of his lot. It was to be a double house, facing Lagrange Street, and the north wall being laid about four feet from the line between the two lots, the front wall being much nearer Lagrange Street than defendant's house. After the foundation wall was laid, the defendant built a screen or board fence, about ten feet in height, along the line of the lots, but upon his own premises, extending from the front wall of the complainant's house backward the whole length of complainant's house. It is claimed by the complainant that the screen or fence was built maliciously, and for the purpose of darkening his (complainant's) rooms, and for no useful purpose. The bill is filed to compel the defendant to remove such fence. On the hearing in the court below, the court decreed such removal within sixty days from the decree, and perpetually enjoined the defendant from building or maintaining such a screen or fence. From this decree defendant appeals.

The testimony was taken in open court, and there seems but little dispute of fact, except as to the motive which induced the defendant to build such a fence. It appears that while the complainant was building his house, and during the time the foundation wall was being placed, the wife of the defendant came up and saw Mrs. Flaherty near there, and inquired if the complainant's house was to stand so near the street, and being advised that it was, she remarked that it would spoil the looks of their place and shut off their south view, and, if it was so built, she would build a board fence between them twelve feet high. Soon after this talk the fence was built. Posts were put in the ground, stringers put across, and the boards, extending up and down, were nailed on these stringers, on the defendant's side, the side towards complainant's house being left rough and unplanned. This fence stands within about four feet of complainant's house, and, as the proofs show, darkens his rooms, and obstructs the light and air. The defendant claims not to have known much about the erection of the fence, but it is shown that he brought the posts there, and paid the bill presented for its construction, though his wife looked generally to the height and character of the fence while it was being built. It is not profitable to recite the evidence given on the hearing. The only excuse made by the defense for its erection comes from the wife of the defendant, who testifies that, while the walls of the complainant's house were being erected, she met Mrs. Flaherty on the corner of the lawn, and inquired if the house was to come so near the street as that, and, being told that it did, she responded to Mrs. Flaherty: "Don't you know that you are going to injure the property on the street, and injure ourselves entirely?" when Mrs. Flaherty said: "We are building the house for ourselves, not for other people;" when Mrs. Moran said: "Very well. We will build a fence for ourselves, and we will make it twelve feet high." Soon after this the fence was built, and has ever since been so kept and maintained.

Mrs. Moran says, upon an inquiry being made as to who maintains it: "I do, for my own benefit,—to keep the neighbors from looking through my house, and to protect my lawn. It is not pleasant to live in a house where folks can look right through it, and have another house down in front of you, that you cannot sit down by a window unless your neighbors can see you. There are times when folks want to be alone in their own house; and, furthermore, I want that fence to plant vines on."

The animus of the whole matter is plainly discernible from the testimony of Mrs. Moran. The complainant had built his house standing somewhat nearer the street than defendant's house, so that Mrs. Moran's view was obstructed towards the south, and she thought it hurt the looks of her place. It is very evident that the fence serves no useful or needful purpose, and was built, and is now maintained, out of pure malice and spite. The case comes so squarely within the opinion of Mr. Justice Morse in Burke v. Smith, 60 Mich. 380, 15 West. Rep. 371, that I shall not discuss the questions of law involved. It was there held, by an equal division of the court as then constituted, that "a fence erected maliciously, and with no other purpose than to shut out the light and air from a neighbor's window, is a nuisance."

I fully approve of the reasoning of Mr. Justice Morse in that case, and rest this case upon the reason there given by him.

The decree must be affirmed, with costs.

The other Justices concurred.

"The unanimous decision of the court in this case having by the adoption of the opinion of Mr. Justice Morse in Burke v. Smith, 15 West. Rep. 371, 60 Mich. 380, now made it for the first time the law of the court, which it was not before, because the court was in that case equally divided, it becomes important to publish that opinion in connection with this case.

By reason of the closeness of the question, and the conflict of decisions upon it in different jurisdictions, the opinions of other members of the court in opposition of that of Mr. Justice Morse are also given here. [Rep.]

MORSE, J.:

The parties to this suit own adjoining lots in the City of Kalamazoo. The complainant built two dwelling-houses on his lots for the purposes of rental; one house fronts on Park Street, the other upon Osborn Street. These houses came up within about two feet of the line between him and the defendant. When these houses were built, Smith had a house on his lot fronting on Park Street, with room for a driveway between his house and complainant's premises. About the time complainant erected his houses, Smith built a house on his lot, fronting on Osborn Street. Complainant's houses were about fourteen feet front, with a single tier of rooms running back from the street.

These parties got into a quarrel, and, as a result of petty annoyances on both sides, the defendant finally put up a screen or fence in front of the lower side windows of the complainant, as it is claimed, covering, obscuring and darkening the same, and shutting out the light and air therefrom. The evidence shows these screens to be two in number, and about eleven feet high, coming up to the top of the lower windows of complainant's houses. They were built by setting posts in the ground and neighbor that his building upon his land with darkness or destroy them. Such being the law here, the reason for the decision in Mahan v. Brown, supra, does not exist and can have no application to the case under consideration.

The ruling in Mahan v. Brown is followed in Phelps v. Newton, 72 N. Y. 38, Charlton v. Wilson, 33 Vt. 30, Walsh v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 333 and many other cases.

In a well reasoned case to 74 Me. 333 Therby v. King, the authorities are reviewed and the court reaches the conclusion "that it cannot be regarded as a matter of universal application that malicious motives must be made out as a condition to recovery in such cases." In that case the defendant dug a well upon his own land, which cut off the source of supply from a spring upon plaintiff's premises. There was a special finding that defendant dug the well for the purpose of diverting the water from the spring and not for the purpose of procuring a better supply of water for himself and improving his estate. The supreme court found that this special finding was not supported by the evidence, but it went on with the doctrine of Phelps v. Newton, and Walsh v. Wilson, supra, and holds, in substance, that if the special finding had been true, the plaintiff's action would have been sustained.

I am satisfied that the doctrine of the court below in this case is just and equitable, and can be sustained, if not by the weight of authority, by the better reason and best authority.

In Hammond v. Richards, 14 N. J. Ch. 377, 383, the court in laying down the rule that the owner of land has a right to the enjoyment of the land and to the underground waters upon it, and that he may in order to obtain that water dig a well to the injury of his neighbor, goes on to say by saying that "it seems right to hold that he ought to exercise his right in a reasonable manner, with up to him injury to his neighbor's rights as may be," and coming to the fact that the plaintiff was digging an art otherwise lawful in itself, though if done with a malicious intent of injuring a neighbor, damages should be given."

In Greenleaf v. French, 16 Pick. 117, it is said: "These rights should not be exercised from mere malice." See also Whitely v. South, 20 Pa. 223, Smith v. Lee, 1 N. H. 331, and Smith v. Youngman, 20 Barb. 316-23, Phelps v. Newton, 72 N. Y. 38, John v. John, 13 Johns 45-51, Hammond v. Richards, 14 N. J. Ch. 377.

In an Ex parte inquiry in regard to but not answered, whether if a person dug upon his premises to the injury of his neighbor, lands, mines, or other things, without any other and when done maliciously and with intent to injure, or for the purpose of procuring a profit, and with the purpose of using his property as an art would be liable for the injury?" Phelps v. Brown, 18 Ohio 311-12.

Mr. Justice in his work on Torts, in speaking of nuisances, says: "If a discomfort is constantly caused from matter or substance, a slight degree of inconvenience may be sufficient to render it actionable." Wheatley v. South, 20 Pick. 117.

Mr. Wheatley in his work on Nuisances, quotes with favor the doctrine as to rights in the use of water and down in Whitely v. South, supra. "Neither the civil nor the common law permit a man to be deprived of a spring or stream of water for the mere convenience of another. The owner of land with a spring issues from the earth has a perfect right to it against all the world except those through whose lands it comes. He has even a right to it against them until it comes in conflict with the enjoyment of their right of property."

Wheatley v. South, 20 Pick. 117.

I cannot see why this principle does not apply with equal force to air and light, which are more free and less capable of control than water, and when there is no in this case no danger of a primary right being acquired in water, the principle assigned by Wheatley and others for the distinction between the two elements, light and water is not applicable. See Wheatley v. South, 20 Pick. 117, and Wheatley v. South, 20 Pick. 117.

If a man has no right to dig a hole upon his premises, not for any benefit to himself or his premises, but for the express purpose of destroying his neighbor's spring, why can he be prevented from doing so? By analogy it seems to me that the same principle applies in both cases, and that the law will intervene and prevent the wanton injury in each instance.

In Phelps v. Newton, 72 N. Y. 38, it is stated that the doctrine is settled in New York "that, if a man has a legal right, courts will not inquire into the motive by which he is actuated in exercising the same. A different rule would tend to the encroachment of litigation and prevent in many instances a complete and full enjoyment of the right of property which inhere in the owner of the soil. As it is desired to do what is particularly useful, or desirable, which accords the intentions of the owner, might often be converted into exercising an improper motive and a man's next neighbor when in need of that they merely stated the actual rights of the party. Water might be drawn, diverted, or taken from its source and put to use, and a well done will be opened by such action, to deprive an owner of what the law regards as well-defined rights."

But it must be remembered that no man has a legal right to make a malicious use of his property, and for any benefit to himself, but for the express purpose of damaging his neighbor. To hold otherwise would make the law a convenient engine, in cases like the present, to injure and destroy the peace and comfort and to damage the property of one's neighbor for no other than a wicked purpose, which is used to or ought to be unlawful. The right to do this against an enlightened country, as it is other to the law of property or in any way or manner. There is no doubt in my mind that these malicious actions of the present case, as they are named in the record, are a nuisance, and were created without right and for a malicious purpose.

What right has the defendant, in the light of the just and beneficent principles of equity, to shut out God's free air and sunlight from the windows of his neighbor and for any benefit or advantage to himself or profit to his land, but simply to gratify his own wicked malice against his neighbor? None whatever.

The wanton infliction of damage can never be a right. It is a wrong and a violation of right, and is not without remedy. The right to breathe the air and to enjoy the sunlight is a natural one and no man can invade the atmosphere or shut out the light of heaven for another reason than that the situation of his property is such that he is given the opportunity of doing so, and seems to gratify his spite and malice toward his neighbor.

It is said that the adoption of statutes in several of the States making the kind of injury actionable, shows that the courts have no right to furnish the redress without statutory authority. It has always been the pride of the common law that it permitted no wrong with damage without a remedy. In all the cases where this class of injury has occurred, proceeding alone from the malice of the defendant, it is not to be a wrong accompanied by damage. That courts have failed to apply the remedy has ever been felt a reproach to the administration of the law, and the fact that the people have regarded this neglect of duty on the part of the courts as great as to make that duty imperative by statute or by furnishing no evidence of the creation of a new right, or the giving of a new remedy, but in a severe criticism upon the courts for an omission of duty already existing and well recognized by statute upon them, which is justly confirmatory of the common law.

The doctrine of the court below should be affirmed, with costs of both courts.

JOHN WOOD, J. concurred.

CAMPBELL, CH. J.

This case, assuming all that is claimed for complainant, is one where he opened windows on the side of his house near defendant's line and defendant built a screen entirely on his own land, high enough to keep his own house as far as the law allows and also porch and entrance are concerned from being open to the view from complainant's windows. No authority has been found, and I am satisfied there is no authority, at least in any region from which we have borrowed our law, which controverts defendant's right to secure his privacy in that way. If we should grant the complainant relief, we should not only be going beyond the judicial province in making the law, but we should also make a rule to conflict with the uniform weight of authority.

It was urged in the argument that there was at least foundation for such relief in the civil law, and that we ought to follow that if we chose. I have searched diligently, and found no such authority. On the other hand the civil law reckoned the right of one proprietor to secure a prospect over his neighbor's land as an easement, which could only be obtained by grant, or possibly by such prescription as would be equivalent to a grant. The civil-law countries in Europe have held a rule if any thing more stringent. In Scotland it is held that such an easement cannot be gained by prescription, or anything short of express contract. Stirling 10.

The reason given is that a man cannot be compelled to build on his own land except to suit his own convenience, and that, if a right of prospect could be gained by mode of time, it would impose a burden on every neighboring proprietor as to the use of his own land, which would be unreasonable.

Domat, in his treatise on the Civil Law, under the head of servitudes, indicates strongly the same doctrine, requiring consent (lib. 1, tit. 12, § 2) and he also refers to the lack of necessity for any extension of privileges. And in his notes on the French Civil Law it is laid down that no action lies for shutting off light where no servitude exists. Legum Delictum, lib. 1, tit. 2, § 4.

In the Institutes of Justinian concerning servitudes (lib. 2, tit. 2, § 4), explaining how servitudes may be created, reference is made expressly to the right of prospect, and the methods of obtaining them are in the text confined to contract and will. By the French Code it is declared that no servitude can be created except by agreement or prescription, and it is not very clear that such a right as that of a prospect over the grounds of another can be gained by anything but grant. Code Civ. Lib. 2, chap. 2, § 1, & L. Compt. Trans. de la Propriété, lib. 2, tit. 2, § 4.

It is expressly declared that no one can, without his neighbor's consent, make windows or other openings in a party wall and where the wall is on one's own ground but near the line no windows can be made except at such a height from the street as will prevent looking over upon the next lot, and with fixed gratings of not more than four inch openings, so that a head cannot be reached through them. Code Civ. lib. 2, tit. 2, § 4.

In this there is quite a resemblance to the customary law of France from which it was borrowed, the custom of Paris declaring that every window cannot be treated by prescription that party walls cannot be pierced; and that windows or lights in walls near the neighbor's land must be nine feet above the ground level and seven and a half feet above each other floor and grates, and not opening. Articles lib. 10, tit. 2.

The right to overlook a neighbor's premises appears by the civil law to be not depending entirely on whether such a servitude has been created. And if it has not been there can be no denial of the right of the neighbor to stop it. This is emphatically declared in Marshall's Roman Law, lib. 2. The only exception for referring to the civil law brought out of a reference to it on the argument which does not appear to be well founded. Our law rests on our own American customs and usages. And a somewhat careful search has failed to bring to light any authority for holding that anyone is bound to permit his privacy to be invaded by his neighbors without the right to screen his premises against them.

There seems to be no particular difference in the common-law authorities in holding that a house owner not using a party wall may have as many windows as he chooses upon his own premises. But there is no little difference as to the right of any neighbor to put up such barriers on his own land as will screen it from observation. There can be no question about the character of such a right as complainant claims. It is the right to have his prospect into defendant's property left unobstructed. It is an easement in the strictest sense of the term, and is among those expressly designated as such by all systems of law. No one can create an easement for himself. If he has no such right, there is no question that it is interfered with, either at law or in equity.

In England it has been held that such an exercise of privilege may, under such circumstances raising a presumption of grant, ripen into the character of an ancient light, which cannot be interfered with. It is there also held that an action will not lie merely for opening such a window, and that the party who desires to prevent it from becoming a right must resort to such measures concerning his own property as will hinder it. There is nothing to prevent the creation of any fence or barrier to smother this result. Mr. Washburn says it down as the result of the American authorities,—some of which allow prescriptive privileges, while most of which deny them altogether,—that the proper and lawful remedy against such wrong is obstructing the view by any efficient means in the premises of the party complaining, and that the measure is of no consequence where there is no contrary right. 8 Wash. Rep. 35. See also Wash. Rep.

It was held in Robert v. Harrod, 1 Moody & B. 124, that there was no easement in a prospect, and that rights in windows did not go so far.

And in Whitson v. Burrows, above cited, it was held that the sale of a house by one owning also the adjacent lot involved no implied covenant not to darken the windows.

And in Wyntonsky v. Lee, 1 Duvall 124, it was recognized that in London there never was any presumption of a right to light. This has been always recognized as the custom of London, and was the law in respect to the passage of an Act of Parliament which changed the disputed presumption which sometimes arose, after long time, into an absolute right after twenty years to have windows left open and made the rule applicable in spite of local customs.

In Yates v. Jack, L. R. 1 Ch. 124, it was held that the statute now in force abolished the custom of London and of other cities, and the court, while commenting on the absurd consequences in a city—its houses being the statute, and require the owner of houses 20, 30 or 40 feet high on one side of a London street to sustain from reaching those higher, and thus impairing the light that would fall on the other side. The result of such a rule is to destroy the value of property, and prevent its owners from using it for natural and proper purposes.

In the natural things there can be no wrong in preventing another from doing what he has no right to do upon.

It was held by this court in Allen v. Kinyon, 4 Barb. 251, that the motive is of no consequence when the party does not violate the rights of another. And in support of the doctrine a case was put on Whitson v. Burrows, 12 Wood. 251, where the case was not the present one in its circumstances, but much more serious. There a fence was put up as the reason was here for the express purpose of preventing the view from fifteen windows over defendant's ground. The court held that where there was no right to the present there was no wrong in fencing it out, and that the defendant's motive was of no consequence, as he was in the exercise of his own right.

In Robert v. Harrod, 12 Wood. 124, this doctrine was approved, and it was further held that the doctrine of ancient rights did not apply here.

It was held by this court in Hawkins v. Sanders, 4 Mich. 491, that there was no right of prospect which would prevent the erection of an awning on a neighboring lot.

In Durant v. Hildall, 11 La. Ann. 764, the same rule was applied to a veranda covering the sidewalk.

The doctrine of Mahon v. Brown has been repeatedly enforced in Illinois in very strong language, the court holding that a fence or screen of any height was lawful to shut off the view from a neighboring window. Mahon v. Brown, 12 Ill. App. 22; Lyons v. Reynolds, 13 Ill. 474.

In Vandergrift v. Tryon, 5 Ill. 431, and Vandergrift v. App. 61, 12 Ill. 431, it was held that in Philadelphia it was an actionable wrong to open windows over a neighbor's ground in a party wall, and relief was granted in equity.

In Shell v. Kempner, 12 Phila. 124, where a bill was filed to prevent tearing down a fence raised to darken a window and to enjoin the continuance of the window it appeared the fence was already torn down, and the party was therefore left to his action of trespass, which it was held would be adequate. So far as the window was concerned, the court, treating as it was not governed by the law of Philadelphia, held it must be dealt with by the general law, and while stating it was such a nuisance as ought to be remedied, the judges considered themselves bound by authority not to hold the mere existence of a window actionable, but to consider, in the light of authority, that the proper remedy was by act of the party by putting up obstructions.

It certainly cannot be any man's duty to rebuild, or to build when he has no occasion for so doing, and when an open yard or grounds may be desirable for his comfort. No one disputes his right to shut off windows in that way. And there is no authority for holding that, if he does not wish to build, he may not in any other effective way secure the privacy which is his right on his own premises. That, according to the sense of all civilized nations, is a valuable domestic right, and if we deny it we shall find no standing-point in jurisprudence to justify it.

I think complainant has no right whatever to complain of defendant's screen, and that his bill should be dismissed, with costs of both courts.

CHAMPLIN, J.:

I concur with my brother Campbell that the decrees should be reversed. The decisions have been quite uniform to the effect that the motives of a party in doing a legal act cannot form the basis upon which to found a remedy against such party. Under these circumstances it should be left to the Legislature to define and prohibit the act, and declare the remedy, as has been recently done in Massachusetts, Vermont and some of the other States. Mass. Pub. Acts 1897, chap. 842; Vt. Pub. Acts 1896, p. 59.

I think, also, that legislation of the character contained in the Statutes above cited is required, and would meet my hearty approval. We should then have a rule certain in its provisions and operative upon all alike, with due and proper safeguards to the owners of private property.

ARIZONA SUPREME COURT.

Board of Directors of TERRITORIAL INSANE ASYLUM

Lewis WOLFLEY, Governor.

(---ARIZ.---)

The Governor of a Territory cannot be compelled by mandamus, on the application of the trustees of the Territorial Insane Asylum, who hold his commission as authority for the public duties they perform, to sign a warrant on the treasurer for funds for the asylum.

(Porter, J., dissent.)

(July 8, 1899.)

APPLICATION for a peremptory writ of mandamus to compel the Governor to countersign a warrant alleged to have been drawn by the auditor upon the treasurer for funds to meet the expenses of the Territorial Insane Asylum. Denied.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Messrs. Herndon & Hawkins, for applicants:

The Board of Directors of the Insane Asylum having made the proper monthly estimate for the current expenses of said asylum as required by law, and presented the same to the auditor, it was his duty to issue the warrant.

See Arizona Rev. Stat. 1887, par. 2483.

Said estimate having been duly made as required, the auditor had no discretion, and certainly the Governor could have none, as the Board of Directors were the parties required by said law to pass upon and make such estimate; and the act required of the Governor, viz., the countersigning of a warrant, was ministerial and in no sense an executive act.

Arizona Rev. Stat. 1887, par. 2966, is as follows: "In all cases of claims audited and allowed against the Territory, and in all cases of grants, salaries, pay and expenses allowed by law, the auditor shall draw a warrant on the treasurer for the amount due, in the form required by law; . . . and every warrant so drawn shall be countersigned by the governor or secretary of the Territory."

Said act is ministerial because the same is authorized to be done by another person, to wit: the secretary of the Territory. And the Legislature could have authorized said warrant to have been issued by the auditor without being countersigned.

See also People v. Brooks, 16 Cal. 11 et seq.; Middleton v. Low, 30 Cal. 598; Harpending v. Haight, 89 Cal. 189; Kendall v. United States, 87 U. S. 12 Pet. 524 (9 L. ed. 1181).

Mr. Clark Churchill, Atty-Gen., for respondent:

The chief executive of this Territory is, as to the performance of any and all official duties, entirely removed from the control of the courts.

U. S. Rev. Stat. § 1841; Arizona Rev. Stat. chap. 7, title 60.

He is beyond the reach of mandamus, not only as to the duties of a strictly executive or political nature, but even as to acts purely ministerial, whose performance the Legislature may have required at his hands.

See High, Extr. Legal Rem. § 120. See also dissenting opinion of Judge Temple in Harpending v. Haight, 89 Cal. 216-223.

The Governor has not only the right, power and authority, but it is his duty, to investigate the facts upon which the estimate is made, and exercise his own judgment and discretion and determine whether any warrant should be drawn, and if he decides it should be drawn, then in what amount, before he should or can lawfully countersign it.

See U. S. Rev. Stat. § 1841; Arizona Rev. Stat. chap. 7, title 60, par. 2939.

The word "shall" does not necessarily carry with it a mandatory signification. It is not construed as "must" except when it is apparent that such was the intent of the Legislature.

Wheeler v. Chicago, 34 Ill. 105.

Mandamus will not lie to compel the Governor to perform any act over which he has the right to exercise his judgment or discretion.

Moses, Mand. p. 80; High, Extr. Legal Rem. §§ 119, 120.

Barnes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It will be conceded that the governor, the head of the executive department of the government, is not amenable to the judicial department by mandamus to direct him in the exercise of any of the powers intrusted to him as such, whatever the degree or character of the discretion imposed upon him. The executive and judicial departments have separate and distinct functions, clearly marked out, and each is independent of the other. The authority to direct the governor by mandamus is denied by very high authority, and the difficulty of the enforcement of the writ has been suggested with great force. The court ought not to issue the writ unless it is prepared to enforce it. Without the means of enforcement the writ would be idle; yet to enforce it might deprive the territory of the executive, and public safety be jeopardized. State v. Towns, 8 Ga. 380; Hawkins v. Governor, 1 Ark. 570.

The right to direct the governor has been limited to the performance of a mere ministerial duty, where such an act has been required of him by law, and where the act is such a one as might have been imposed upon any other person and to enforce a vested private right. This was the limit in the case of Kendall v. United States, 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 524 [9 L. ed. 1181].

Even in questions affecting private right, if the final decision is with the executive, and the act is a public act, he is independent. People v. Bissell, 19 Ill. 229; State v. Chase, 5 Ohio St. 535; Chamberlain v. Sibley, 4 Minn. 312 (Gil. 228); Harpending v. Haight, 39 Cal. 189; People v. Hatch, 38 Ill. 9; Marbury v. Madison, 5 U. S. 1 Cranch, 170 [2 L. ed. 71].

In the latter case the chief justice declared:

"It is not by the office of the person to whom the writ is directed, but the nature of the thing to be done, that the propriety or impropriety of issuing a mandamus is to be determined. Where the head of a department acts in a case in which executive discretion is to be exercised, in which he is the mere organ of executive will, it is again repeated that any application to a court to control in any respect his conduct would be rejected without hesitation. But where he is directed by law to do a certain act affecting the absolute rights of individuals, in the performance of which he is not placed under the particular direction of the president, and the performance of which the president cannot lawfully forbid, the writ may issue."

Here is an application by trustees of one of the territorial charities,—the Insane Asylum,—a branch of the executive department, and whose commission they hold as authority for the public duties they perform, seeking to mandamus the executive to perform a public duty. They have no personal vested rights. They ask as officers, not as individuals. No authority can be found where mandamus has been issued against a governor of a State or Territory in such a case. It is a civil remedy for the protection of purely civil rights. High, Extr. Legal Rem. § 118 et seq., and cases cited, § 430 et seq., and cases cited; People v. University of Michigan, 4 Mich. 98.

The act which is sought to be enforced upon the Governor in this case is one that is included in the inherent functions of his office. He is the official head of the executive department of the Territory, and, as such, the territorial, penal and charitable institutions are subordinate to him. These trustees hold his commission, and he must see that the laws are faithfully executed by them. One of the means of doing so is to be found in the act sought to be enforced in this case. With it the courts have nothing to do, as the Governor must take the responsibility, and it cannot by him or against him be shifted upon the judicial department.

The writ is denied.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO., Plf. in Err.,

v.

F. M. TAYLOR.

(....Ga....)

*1. The jurisdiction of justices' courts being limited by the Constitution to "civil cases arising ex contractu, and cases of injuries or damages to personal property," they cannot be invested by the Legislature with jurisdiction over actions to recover a penalty imposed by statute upon telegraph companies for undue delay in the transmission and delivery of messages. The penalty is for the wrongful violation of a public duty, and neither in whole nor in part for a mere breach of contract.

2. A suit in a court having no jurisdiction of the subject matter resulting in a judgment for the defendant, is a nullity.

3. Even payment by the company of the expenses of the plaintiff, incurred by reason of non-delivery of the message, would not, unless received in full settlement or by way of accord and satisfaction, bar an action for the penalty.

4. The charge of the court was substantially correct, and if, in some respects, inaccurate, there was no material error.

5. The evidence warranted the verdict.

ERROR to the Macon City Court to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover the statutory penalty for failure to promptly deliver a telegram. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Gustin, Guerry & Hall for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Marmaduke G. Bayne for defendant in error.

Blackley, C. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action was by Mrs. Taylor against the Telegraph Company to recover a penalty of $100 for failure to deliver to her a telegram sent from Macon to Brunswick by Bayne, and addressed to her. It was founded on the Act of 1887 (Pamph. Laws, 111), which reads as follows: "Every electric telegraph company with a line of wires wholly or partly in this State, and engaged in telegraphing for the public, shall, during the usual office hours, receive dispatches, whether from other telegraphic lines or from individuals; and on payment or tender of the usual charge, according to the regulations of such company, shall transmit and deliver the same with impartiality and good faith, and with due diligence, under penalty of $100, which penalty may be recovered by a suit in a justice or other court having jurisdiction thereof, by either the sender of the dispatch or the person to whom sent or directed, whichever may first sue, provided, that nothing herein shall be construed as impairing or in any way modifying the right of any person to recover damages for any such breach of contract or duty by any telegraph company; and said penalty and said damages may, if the party so elect, be recovered in the same suit. Such companies shall deliver all dispatches to the persons to whom the same are addressed, or to their agents, on payment of any charges due for the same, provided, such persons or agents reside within one mile of the telegraphic station, or within the city or town in which such station is. In all cases the liability of said companies for messages in cipher, in whole or in part, shall be the same as though the same were not in cipher."

The Company pleaded specially in bar of the action that Bayne, the sender of the message, had sued, prior to the filing of this suit, for the same penalty in a justice's court, and that a recovery was had by the Company. The plea alleged that the justice's court was a court of competent jurisdiction, but upon motion of plaintiff's counsel the plea was stricken, on the ground that the justice's court had no jurisdiction. The jury having found for the plaintiff, the Company moved for a new trial because of this ruling, and on various other grounds. This motion was overruled.

1. The general scheme of the Constitution in conferring jurisdiction upon the inferior courts, which it specifies, is to deal exhaustively with the subjects matter which it mentions and enumerates. This scheme extends also, even as to the superior court, to means and modes of exercising jurisdiction, as, for instance, new trials and writs of certiorari. Pitts v. Carr, 81 Ga. 454; Mazrell v. Twmlin, 79 Ga. 570; Pope v. Jones, Id. 487. Doubtless the Legislature might by statute confer additional jurisdiction on some of the courts and magistrates mentioned in the Constitution, but to do so the material for such superadded jurisdiction would have to be drawn from other subjects matter; that is, from such as the Constitution has not dealt with expressly in making distribution of judicial powers among the inferior courts, etc., which it enumerates. The Act of 1887, above recited, is certainly a legislative attempt to clothe justices' courts with jurisdiction over actions for penalty, and whether the attempt can be held efficacious or not depends upon a right classification of such actions with reference to art. 6, § 7, par. 2 (Code 1882, § 5153), of the Constitution of 1877. The paragraph reads as follows: "Justices of the peace shall have jurisdiction in all civil cases arising ex contractu, and in cases of injuries or damages to personal property, when the principal sum does not exceed $100, and shall sit monthly at fixed times and places; but in all cases there may be an appeal to a jury in said court, or an appeal to the superior court, under such regulations as may be prescribed by law." The corresponding provision in the Constitution of 1868 (Code 1873, § 5104) was as follows: "The justices of the peace shall have jurisdiction, except as hereinafter provided, in all civil cases where the principal sum claimed does not exceed $100, and may sit at any time for the trial of such cases; but, in cases where the sum claimed is more than $50, there may be an appeal to the superior court, under such regulations as may be prescribed by law."

It is manifest that the later Constitution intended to narrow the earlier one in respect to the jurisdiction of justices' courts over civil cases. Both Constitutions fix the same limit as to amount, but in one there is no limit whatever as to the nature of the civil cases over which jurisdiction may be exercised, save where exclusive jurisdiction is conferred on some other court, while in the other the cases are such only as arise ex contractu or from torts to personal property. Though the Legislature may, perhaps, confer at will jurisdiction upon justices' courts or justices of the peace touching some subjects matter, the subject matter of "civil cases," in so far as these courts or magistrates can take cognizance of the same, is dealt with exhaustively by the Constitution. The Legislature has no more power to invest them with jurisdiction over civil cases not arising ex contractu, or from torts to personal property, than over cases involving more than $100 principal, or those arising ex delicto from injuries to real property. It follows that, unless an action for a penalty is one arising ex contractu within the sense and meaning of the Constitution, the justice's court which entertained and decided the suit brought by Bayne, the sender of the message, against the Company, was without jurisdiction, for it is manifest that the suit was not for injury or damage to personal property.

2. The decisive question, then, is whether an action for the penalty imposed upon telegraph companies by the Act of 1887 is one arising ex contractu. Had the expression been "civil cases in form ex contractu," there would have been no doubt as to its embracing actions for a penalty, for debt is a form of action ex con- trespass; and that debt upon a statute for a penalty definite in amount was generally, if not always, maintainable, is quite certain. 1 Chitty, Pl. 112, 871-875; Bullard v. Bull, 1 Mason, 200.

But, though in form an contractu, the action for a penalty was, and still is, founded upon a tort. 1 Chitty, Pl. 45; Chaffee v. United States, 85 U. S. 19 Wall. 516 [21 L. ed. 908]; Martin v. McNight, 1 Overt. (Tenn.) 800.

In McCoun v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 50 N. Y. 176, which was a suit brought to recover a penalty or forfeiture under a statute to prevent extortion by railroad companies, Allen, J., said: "Upon the question actually decided by the court below, I am of the opinion that that court erred in holding the summons to have been regularly issued under the first subdivision of section 129 of the Code. The actions within that subdivision must 'arise on contract, and be for the recovery of money only.' This action is for the recovery of money only, and in that respect is within the provisions of the subdivision, but is not upon contract. That term was used in its ordinary and proper sense. A contract is a drawing together of minds until they meet, and an agreement is made to do or not to do some particular thing. It may be express, or it may be implied or inferred from circumstances, and this implication is but the result of the ordinary and universal experience of mankind. If A borrows money of B, the courts may imply a promise to repay the money, for the universal experience is that in such a case a promise is exacted and made. An implied promise or contract is but an express promise, proved by circumstantial evidence. It is quite distinct from that fiction by which a statute liability has been deemed sufficient to sustain an action of assumpsit, upon the ground that a party subjecting himself to the penalty or other liability imposed by statute has promised to pay it. That feature does not suppose a contract, but simply a promise ex parte. In this view, every man promises not to trespass on his neighbor's property, or to commit an assault upon his person, and an action of assumpsit might be brought and summons issued, under the first subdivision of section 129, for a breach of this implied contract to observe the laws. The Code was not dealing with a legal fiction in prescribing a form of summons in actions arising on contract. A statute liability wants all the elements of a contract, consideration and mutuality, as well as the assent of the party." And Peckham, J., in the same case, said: "Is this 'an action arising on contract?' It is an action for a penalty for violating a statute. It is claimed to arise on contract, upon the principle stated in 8 Bl. Com. 161, whereby a forfeiture imposed by the by-laws of a corporation, upon any that belong to the body, immediately creates a debt, for which an action of debt will lie by the party injured. This principle is declared by Blackstone to be 'an implied original contract to submit to the rule of the community whereof we are members.' He then adds that the same reason may, with equal justice, be applied to all penal statutes. This principle, if carried out by the same reasoning, would abolish all actions of tort. The implied original contract to obey all statutes, by the same principle and the same reasoning, extends to all laws, whether statutory or common law. It is surely not confined to the obeying of all statute law simply. Thus assumpsit, if not debt, would lie for an assault and battery, or for arson, etc. I incline to think that this provision of the Code had no reference to this fiction of the law of an implied original contract to obey the laws of the land by each member of the community. But it meant what it plainly says. In section 53 of the Code, 'an action for a penalty' is stated as impliedly different from an action on contract for the payment of money and a justice of the peace is expressly given jurisdiction of both. The Code thus recognizes the difference between actions upon contract and an action for a penalty. It is not enough that the recovery is to be for 'money only,' but the action must arise on contract also, to bring the case under the first subdivision. I think it plain that this action does not arise on contract."

The large and loose meaning given to contracts by Blackstone (8 Com. 158-160), as including all obligations, even those arising out of the social compact, is too comprehensive to serve as a guide to the real meaning of the clause of the Constitution which we are considering. Works on contracts generally have confined the term "contract" within much narrower limits. Mr. Bishop is the only writer, so far as we know, who, in a work devoted to contracts solely, has endeavored to broaden his definition of the term so as to make it reach and include what Lowrie, J., in Hertog v. Hertog, 29 Pa. 467, 468, denominates "constructive contracts," which he says are "fictions of law adapted to enforce legal duties by actions of contract, where no proper contract exists, express or implied." For Mr. Bishop's definition, see Bishop, Cont. § 22, and that he intended to include, like Blackstone, the fictitious case of a statutory penalty, see sections 182-206.

But it may be said that there is an actual contract from which the present action arises, namely, that made by Bayne as the sender of the message. That contract, however, with all its consequences except the penalty, is left intact by the Act of 1867. The penalty is not given, in whole or in part, as compensation in damages for a violation of that contract. On the contrary, both the sender, with whom the Company had a contract, and the person to whom the telegram was addressed, and with whom the Company had no contract, are left in full possession of all their rights, outside of penalty in every respect. That the penalty is imposed solely for the wrongful violation of a public duty is manifest, and it seems to us to make no difference that this particular instance of that duty had its origin in contract. The case belongs to that particular class so well described by Mr. Bishop in his work on Non-Contract Law, §§ 73, 74, in which he says: "Though a tort is a breach of a duty which the law, in distinction from a mere contract, has imposed, yet the imposing of it may have been because of a contract, or because of it and something else combining, when otherwise it would not have created the duty. In such a case commonly, . . . the party injured by the nonfulfillment of the duty may proceed against the other for its breach, or for the breach of the contract, at his election. Thus (§ 74), because a common carrier, whether of goods or passengers, is a sort of public servant, the law imposes its duties upon him, a breach whereof is a tort, though there is also a contract which is violated by the same act."

The principle here announced is the one recognized by this court in Head v. Georgia Pac. R. Co. 79 Ga. 358, and in other cases. A striking instance of its application will be seen in the case of Tatman v. Great Western R. Co. 2 El. & El. 351, in which the terms "action founded on contract," and "action of contract," were under construction. See also Pontifex v. Midland R. Co. L. R. 3 Q. B. Div. 37.

The Supreme Court of Indiana, in adjudicating upon a statute in some respects identical with our own, has held that the penalty is for a breach of duty, and not damages for the breach of contract. W. U. Tel. Co. v. Pendleton, 95 Ind. 12.

In Schaffer v. McNamara, 10 Berg. & R. 44, the words "causes of action arising upon contract, either express or implied," used in conferring jurisdiction upon justices of the peace, were held to be limited to the case of an agreement or understanding immediately between the parties; and Gibson, J., said: "It is evident, therefore, that it is not the form of the action, but the nature of the subject matter of it, which must decide the question of jurisdiction. Actions of debt often arise ex maleficio, and where there is not the semblance of a contract, as in all cases of penalties imposed by statute; for there the debt is created by the law, and not by the agreement of the parties." Accordingly it was held in Zeigler v. Gram, 10 Berg. & R. 104, that a justice of the peace has no jurisdiction of debt for a penalty imposed by a statute for not entering satisfaction of a judgment. While the term "contract," used in its very widest sense, would, as may be seen from Blackstone and Bishop, take in penalties incurred by violating a statute, the ordinary use of the word in the common law is less comprehensive. The use of it in our Code is attended with a precise definition: "A 'contract' is an agreement between two or more parties for the doing or not doing of some specified thing." § 2714.

A "contract of record" is then defined, then "specialty" is defined; and section 2718 adds: "All other contracts than those specified above are termed simple contracts."

It seems obvious that a penalty imposed by statute is not embraced either in the language or the meaning of the Code. What the Code says of actions (§ 2250 et seq.) would seem to exclude a certain class of penalties from civil actions altogether, and put them in a class denominated "penal actions." "A civil action is one founded on private rights, arising either from contract or tort." "A penal action is one allowed in pursuance of public justice under particular laws. If no special officer is authorized to be the plaintiff therein, the State or the governor, or the attorney or solicitor general may be the plaintiff." §§ 2269, 2264.

The technical expression, "arising ex contractu," used by the Constitution, is found in section 2361 of the Code, which says: "All claims arising ex contractu between the same parties may be joined in the same action, and all claims arising ex delicto may in like manner be joined." The words "actions ex contractu" are found in section 2912, and perhaps in other sections. We think a penalty such as that under consideration arises ex delicto, and consequently that a justice's court has no jurisdiction, and can have none conferred upon it by statute, of any suit to recover such a penalty. We are forced to this conclusion, and do not reach it of our own choice; for we agree with the Legislature in thinking it desirable for justices' courts to have jurisdiction of this class of actions. A prompt and cheap remedy in such cases would subserve the public convenience, and be conducive to the attainment of justice in matters of daily concern, embracing almost a countless number of transactions, widely diffused throughout the State.

3. It follows that there was no error in striking the plea; for a previous suit in a court having no jurisdiction could not result in anything but a void judgment, and such a judgment is open to attack any and every where. Code, §§ 3504, 3508. The suit itself was a legal nullity.

4. It seems that the plaintiff, before she brought her action for the penalty, made out and presented to the Company an account for her expenses incurred by a needless trip from Brunswick to Macon, this trip being made in consequence of her failure to receive the message which Mr. Bayne, her attorney, had ordered to be sent by telegraph. It does not appear whether this account for expenses was paid by the Company or not, but no settlement by way of accord and satisfaction is pleaded or proved, nor would the mere payment of such expenses bar an action for the penalty. The Statute leaves the right to damages where it was before the penalty was imposed. It has been correctly held that paying back the amount received for sending a dispatch, unless it is agreed that such payment shall be in full of all the party has a right to recover, will not hinder an action for the penalty. Western U. Tel. Co. v. Buchanan, 85 Ind. 400.

5. The action treated the penalty as resulting from a failure to deliver the telegram, and not from a failure to transmit it; nevertheless, delay in transmitting might be considered by the jury as involved in a failure to deliver. But, even if the charge of the court upon this subject was inaccurate, it did no harm, the failure to deliver promptly being fully established by the evidence. The same may be said as to any and all verbal inaccuracies which the charge may have contained.

6. We see no reason to question the sufficiency of the evidence to warrant the verdict. Western U. Tel. Co. v. McKidden, 114 Ind. 511, 12 West. Rep. 379.

1. A publication charging that a teacher of a certain system of shorthand is incompetent to teach that system, and is using the name of the author of the system without authority, is libelous.
2. Any written words which have a tendency to injure a person in his or her office, profession, calling or trade, are libelous.
3. The office of an innuendo is to define the defamatory meaning which the plaintiff in a libel suit sets upon the words, and to show how they came to have that meaning and how they relate to the plaintiff.
4. An averment of special damage is not necessary in an action for libel, where the words are written of plaintiff in his or her profession or trade.

NOTE.—Libel and slander; words tending to injure person in office.

An action will lie for the publication of words which directly tend to prejudice or injure one in his office, profession, trade or business. Williams v. Davenport (Minn.) Jan. 28, 1890.

Neither the public press nor individuals can discuss the conduct and character of officers and candidates for office, without incurring liability, civil or criminal, for defamatory utterances published, although such publications may be made without malice and upon probable cause. Banner Pub. Co. v. State, 16 Lea, 178.

Any written words are libelous which impute to a man fraud, dishonesty, immorality, etc., or that he is suspected of such conduct, or which suggest that he is suffering from any infectious disease, which have a tendency to injure him in his office, profession or trade, or which hold him up to contempt, hatred, scorn or ridicule. Richardson v. State, 5 Cent. Rep. 793, 68 Md. 305.

Words not otherwise actionable may form the basis of an action for slander when spoken of a party in respect of his office, profession or business; and this principle embraces all temporal offices or trusts, without limitation. White v. Nichols, 44 U. S. 2 How. 306 (21 L. ed. 521).

The words need not import a charge of crime, yet they must go at least so far as to impute to him some incapacity or lack of due qualification to fill the position, or some positive past misconduct which will injuriously affect him in it, or the holding of principles which are hostile to the maintenance of the government. *Sillars v. APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 2, for Philadelphia County, sustaining a demurrer to the declaration in an action to recover damages for the publication of an alleged libel. Reversed.

The grounds of complaint sufficiently appear in the opinion.

The grounds of demurrer were:

"First. Because the matter contained in said statement is not libelous.

"Second. Because said statement does not set forth any cause of action.

"Third. Because the alleged libelous matter set forth in the statement does not warrant or justify the innuendoes in said statement.

"Fourth. Because the innuendoes contained in said statement enlarge and add to the fair and proper meaning of the matter alleged to be libelous.

A publication charging a county auditor with making a false statement of the financial condition of the county is libelous if the charges are false. Pomeroy v. Oulha, 117 Ind. 106.

It is not necessary that the words used in a published article should be slanderous, to sustain an action for libel. Ibid.

The following words spoken of a city attorney: "He is unfit to hold the office of city attorney. His opinion is too easily warped for money consideration."—do not necessarily indicate dereliction of duty or dishonesty, and are not actionable per se. Greenwood v. Cobbe (Neb.) May 16, 1890.

A publication which charges plaintiff, a deputy sheriff, with gross misconduct in office, is libelous, as holding plaintiff up to the scorn and aversion of the public. Bourrasseau v. Detroit Evening Journal Co. 6 West. Rep. 161, 68 Mich. 638.

Mr. James H. Shakespeare for appellee.

McCollum, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant having demurred to the declaration, all relevant matters well pleaded therein must be accepted as true. Widder v. McKee, 111 Pa. 325, 1 Cent. Rep. 919.

The facts of the case, as we gather them from the declaration, are, that the plaintiff, at the time of the committing of the grievances therein mentioned, was the proprietor of the Haven College of Shorthand and Typewriting, located at 1223 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, and was fully competent and authorized to teach the Haven system of shorthand. The defendant was the principal of a rival school, located at 1223 Chestnut Street. These were the only schools in Philadelphia in which the Haven system of shorthand writing was then taught. The defendant, with full knowledge of these facts, published certain certificates over the signature of Curtis Haven, author of Haven's shorthand system, in which it was stated that the only authorized Haven College in Philadelphia was at 1223 Chestnut Street, of which the defendant was the principal; that he could recommend her teaching, but not that of another teacher who was using his name without authority, and for whose teaching he would not be responsible. The defendant also published a circular over her own signature, in which it was stated that there were other teachers of Haven's shorthand in Philadelphia, and that one of them was using the name, Haven College, without authority. The declaration contains verbatim copies of these publications, and alleges that they charge and were intended to charge that the plaintiff was incompetent to teach the Haven system of shorthand, and that she was using the name, Haven College, without authority, and that, by means of these accusations, falsely and maliciously made, she has been greatly prejudiced in her reputation and business, and has sustained great loss therein. It specifically describes the injuries inflicted on her business by the publications recited in it, and lays her damages at $5,000.

It is contended in support of the demurrer that the matter set out in the declaration is not libelous, and that the innuendo is not justified by it. Any written words which have a tendency to injure a person in his or her office, profession, calling or trade, are libelous. Odgers, Libel and Slander, p. 19.

An innuendo cannot introduce new matter, or enlarge the natural meaning of words, or put upon them a construction they will not bear. Its office is to define the defamatory meaning which the plaintiff sets upon the words, to show how they come to have that meaning, and how they relate to the plaintiff. If they are capable of the meaning he ascribes to them, it is for the jury to say whether they were used in that sense. Id. p. 100, and authorities cited; Burman v. Beyer, 3 Binn. 515; 8 L. R. A.

Thompson v. Lusk, 3 Watts, 17; Com. v. Keenan, 87 Pa. 308.

As at the time of the grievances mentioned in the declaration there were but two schools in Philadelphia in which the Haven system of shorthand was taught, it is clear that the publications referred to the plaintiff, and we think that they justify the innuendo which defines the meaning she ascribes to them. The declaration contains an averment of special damages, although, in libel, or where words are spoken of another in the way of his or her profession or trade, it is not necessary. Odgers, Libel and Slander, 235.

Judgment reversed, and procedendo awarded.

2 Waterman, Corp. p. 554; State v. Milwaukee Chamber of Commerce, 20 Wis. 68.

Clark, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This proceeding in the court below was a mandamus, brought by Arthur Burt, to compel the Union League of Philadelphia to re-instate him to membership in the League, from which he had been expelled. The petition was filed, and the alternative writ issued, on the 20th of May, 1863, and on the 23d of June thereafter the defendant's return was filed. The relator thereupon put in a plea traversing the return, but afterwards withdrew the plea, and filed a demurrer; all relevant matters contained in the return must necessarily, therefore, be deemed admitted and accepted as true. By the return it appears that the Union League of Philadelphia was incorporated on the 30th of March 1864, during the War of the Rebellion, "for the purpose of fostering and promoting the love of republican government, aiding in the preservation of the Union of the United States, and extending aid and relief to the soldiers and sailors of the army and navy thereof." By their charter the incorporators were entitled to perpetual succession, and were enabled to take and hold title to real and personal property, and to dispose of the same, "provided that the clear yearly value or income of all the estate and property of said corporation, including interest on all moneys by them lent, shall not exceed the sum of $10,000, exclusive of the real estate in the actual occupancy of the corporation." The officers of the League consist of a president, four vice presidents and fifteen directors, to be elected annually, who are authorized to choose and appoint from their own number a secretary and a treasurer.

The third section of the charter is as follows:

"3. That the duties and rights of the members of the said corporation, the powers and functions of the officers thereof, the mode of supplying vacancies in office, the times of meeting of said corporation or its officers, the number which shall constitute a quorum thereof, respectively, at any such meeting, the mode of electing or admitting members, the terms of their admission and the causes which justify their expulsion, and the manner of effecting the same, and the mode and manner in which the property of said corporation shall be divided and appropriated in case of a dissolution of said corporation, or winding up of its affairs, shall be regulated by the by laws and ordinances of said corporation, which they are empowered to make and alter, in the manner which may be therein mentioned,—provided, that the said by-laws and ordinances shall not be repugnant to, or inconsistent with, the Constitution and laws of the United States or of this Commonwealth."

The first section of the by-laws, afterwards made in pursuance of the charter, provides as follows:

"The members of the Union League of Philadelphia shall support the Constitution of the United States, discountenance, by moral and social influences, all disloyalty to the federal government, encourage and maintain respect for its authority, compliance with its laws and acquiescence in its measures for the enforcement thereof, and for the suppression of insurrection, treason and rebellion, as duties obligatory upon every American citizen."

By the return, moreover, it appears that, "although the purposes for which the corporate defendant was originally created were correctly set forth in the preamble to its said charter, yet the purposes of social intercourse entered as an element into its usefulness, and as the causes which led to its creation ceased to exist, within little more than a year thereafter, the element of social intercourse increased, and although its members are, to a large extent, composed of persons of a certain political faith, as is the case with similar institutions in other cities of the world, yet a chief purpose of the institution is, and long has been, the promotion of social intercourse between the members themselves, and between the latter and the guests of the corporation, and to this end there was and is required the adoption of, and strict compliance with, certain rules of internal discipline, regulating the intercourse within its walls." To advance the purposes of the League, and to promote the social relations of its members, the League became the owner of valuable real estate, upon which is erected a club house, which is maintained and governed according to certain rules and regulations, contained in the by-laws, promulgated under the 3d section of the charter.

The 2d section of the first article, in defining "the duties and rights of the members," provides that the members, "shall have free access to the rooms and library of the League, subject to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed from time to time by the board of directors."

The 1st, 2d, 3d and 4th sections of the second article, defining "the powers and functions of the officers," provides that the board of directors shall consist of the president, vice-presidents and fifteen directors, elected annually, eight of their number to constitute a quorum; that this board of direction shall have power to appoint executive committees to carry into effect the objects expressed in the charter and to prescribe their duties; to "exercise a general superintendence of the affairs of the League, with the control and management of its property and effects;" "to make all rules for the management and regulation of the house, and the maintenance of good order therein, and to provide and enforce penalties for their infraction."

The 5th section of the same article is as follows:

"A majority of the board shall have power to suspend members for a willful infraction of the rules of the house, or of any by-law of the League, or for acts or conduct which they may deem disorderly, or injurious to the interests or hostile to the objects of the League, but the offender may appeal from the sentence of suspension as hereinafter provided; but prior to the suspension of a member, he shall be entitled to notice and a hearing before the board, or before a committee of the same, as he may elect."

The fourth article provides for an appeal, and the trial thereof, as follows:

"1. A member suspended from the League, by sentence of the board of directors, may appeal therefrom, within thirty days after notice thereof posted on the notice board, by filing with the secretary a written notice of his appeal and the reasons therefor. In case of no appeal within the time limited, he shall then cease to be a member of the League.

"2. All appeals shall be tried in a meeting of the League, to be called for the purpose, by the board of directors, within forty days after notice of the appeal shall be filed with the secretary.

"3. The president, or one of the vice-presidents, shall preside at such meetings, and the S. L. R. A. cause of suspension shall be reported, in writing, by the board of directors, with a statement of facts on which their sentence was founded, a copy of which shall be furnished to the appellant, on his application, to be made to the secretary at least ten days before the meeting. The appellant shall then present his defense in writing, to which one member of the board may reply orally. The appellant, or any one member in his behalf, may then rejoin and a director may a second time speak in support of the charge, and no further discussion shall be allowed. The presiding officer shall then put the question, "Shall the sentence of the board of managers in this case be affirmed?" If a majority of the meeting shall vote in the affirmative, the sentence shall stand as the final judgment of the League, and the appellant shall thereupon forfeit all the rights and privileges of membership. If less than a majority of the meeting vote in the affirmative, then the sentence of the board shall be reversed, and the appellant shall thereupon be restored to membership."

By the fifth section of article 1, it is provided that, "when a person shall cease to be a member from any cause, all the interest he may have in the property of the League by reason of his membership shall be vested in the corporation."

The penalty, in case of conviction of an offense under the 5th section of the by-laws, it will be observed, is, practically, expulsion—the suspension from the privileges of the League is only during the pendency of proceedings, upon conviction by the board, before and after appeal. If no appeal be taken within the time specified, or if one be taken and not sustained, expulsion follows. Suspension indicates merely the status of the member after conviction by the board, pending the time for taking and trial of the appeal. The sentence of the League cannot, therefore, in any proper sense, be said to enlarge the judgment, as intimated by the learned judge of the court below. We have quoted extensively from the charter, to show that the power of expulsion was expressly conferred upon the corporation by the charter, with the right to regulate the causes which would justify the exercise of that power and to define the mode or manner of its exercise, and even more extensively, from the by-laws, to exhibit the rules and regulations, which were made in pursuance of the charter, for the government of the League, and for the trial and expulsion of members offending against them, in order that we may, in the further consideration of the case, see whether or not these by-laws in any way conflict with the charter, or with the Constitution or laws, federal or state.

On the 2d of May, 1870, as we learn from the defendant's return, the relator was elected a member of the League, and, on the 7th of May, signed the book of membership, which contained a copy of the charter and by-laws. On the 30th of December, 1883, a formal charge was preferred against him, by Mr. William M. Littleton, a fellow member, to the effect that the relator was guilty of "conduct unbecoming a gentleman, and a member of the League," specifying, more particularly, that on the Friday preceding, in the restaurant of the League, the relator had used grossly insulting language to the complainant, and that, under the circumstances, the complainant had no recourse but to report the facts to the League. Whereupon, at a meeting of the board of directors, on the 9th of January, 1893, the house committee reported the relator, "for action under article 2, section 5, of the by laws," and moved that notice be sent to Mr. Burt in accordance therewith; and in the event that Mr. Burt should choose to be tried by a committee, the president was authorized to appoint a committee not exceeding five, to hear the case and report to the board; which was agreed to. The relator having been duly notified, elected to be heard by a committee, and the president thereupon appointed Messrs. E. N. Benson, William O. Houston, Samuel C. Perkins and Edwin H. Fidler, the four vice presidents, to hear the case. That committee met at the League on the evenings of January 16 and January 24, on both of which occasions Mr. Burt was present and witnesses were examined. A counter-charge of the use of offensive language by Mr. Littleton, as a provocation for Mr. Burt's conduct, having been filed, and an intimation given that Mr. Littleton was under the influence of liquor at the time of the interviews between them, witnesses were called and examined upon that question also.

At a meeting of the board of directors held on the 13th of February, 1893, the committee reported that they were satisfied they had seen and heard everyone who could throw any light on the occurrence, which led to the report of the house committee, and that they found the following facts:

1. That on December 9, 1892, Arthur Burt, in the restaurant of the League, was guilty of rude and ungentlemanly conduct, and told a fellow member, William E. Littleton, that he was acting like a blackguard.

2. That the offense was without provocation on the part of Mr. Littleton.

3. That Mr. Littleton was not at the time under the influence of liquor.

The committee submitted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That Arthur Burt has been guilty of a violation of art. 2, § 5, of the by-laws of the Union League, and that he be, and is, hereby suspended, from this date, from the privileges of a member."

Whereupon, on motion, the report was accepted by the board and the resolution adopted.

On the 18th of March, 1893, the relator entered and gave notice of an appeal, assigning the following reasons in support of it:

1. That the testimony produced at the hearing in the matter before the committee does not show any sufficient cause for the censure or suspension imposed by the board.

2. That the offense for which said sentence of suspension was imposed was of such a trifling nature that the punishment by suspension is an unnecessarily harsh and severe one.

A special meeting of the League was thereupon called, upon due and proper notice, for trial of this appeal on the 3d of April, 1893, the trial to be conducted under article 4 of the by-laws. There were present at this meeting 379 persons, which was a quorum; the president, George H. Boker, in the chair, and the trial was proceeded with. The statement of the board, in writing, setting forth the facts as found by the committee, and the action of the board of directors thereon, was first read. In this statement the board set forth that the counter charge against Mr. Littleton, having been found to be wholly unwarranted, was deemed an aggravation of the relator's offense, and the further fact that the relator had on a previous occasion been suspended for a very gross offense, of a similar character (which is fully set forth in the return), and had only been reinstated upon promise of amendment, and a pledge that there would be no further cause of complaint, was a matter which entered into the consideration of the board in inflicting the sentence of expulsion.

The relator's statement in writing was then read. No witnesses were called; neither of the parties appear to have expressed any desire to that effect; the appeal was submitted upon the facts found by the committee. Mr. Pettit addressed the meeting on behalf of the board; Mr. McVeigh, in behalf of Mr. Burt, and Mr. Perkins closed the discussion. The president then put the question: "Shall the sentence of the board of managers, in this case, be affirmed?" The result of the vote was 146 ayes, and 75 noes; members present 379. A majority of those present having voted in the affirmative, the president announced that the appeal was not sustained, and that Mr. Arthur Burt ceased to be a member of the Union League.

We give this statement of the relator's arraignment, trial and conviction from the defendant's return, where the facts, we think, are stated, not argumentatively, inferentially or evasively, but with fair and reasonable certainty. The cause of the relator's disfranchisement, and the proceedings by which it was effected, are distinctly and clearly set forth. It is true, the relator does not appear to have been found guilty of "acts or conduct" which by the board were "deemed disorderly," or "injurious to the interests or hostile to the objects of the League," in totidem verbis; he was found guilty of rude and ungentlemanly conduct in the League House, in this, that, without cause or provocation, he charged upon a fellow member that he was acting like a blackguard. This was certainly conduct of a disorderly character, especially as it occurred within the club house, a place devoted to the cultivation of friendly political and social relations between gentlemen, and might well be deemed disorderly by the board of directors; that the board did deem the act disorderly, and injurious to the interests, and hostile to the objects, of the League, is shown by their formal resolution to that effect.

It is not expected that the proceedings of a trial of this character, which are conducted in most cases by persons unlearned in the law, will be expressed with absolute technical accuracy, or will be subjected to the severe scrutiny which is applied by persons of critical professional skill in courts of law. If the proceedings are regular, and conducted in good faith; if the accused has been accorded a full and fair hearing, and a proper finding and judgment have been entered upon the facts, and the whole proceeding is stated with substantial accuracy,—it is sufficient. The trial seems to have been conducted in an orderly manner, ac-ording to the strict letter of the by-laws of the League. The proceedings are in due form, and the relator, for anything that appears, was allowed the benefit of a full and impartial hearing, before a committee of the board, at his own election. It does not appear that he was denied any right or privilege to which he was entitled. There is no allegation, much less evidence, of fraud or unfairness, and we assume that the action of the League was in good faith.

The only question, as we understand the case, is one of power. Was the League duly and legally authorized by the by-laws to expel the relator from membership for the offense charged, and of which he was convicted?

The case of Beane v. Philadelphia Club, 80 Pa. 107, bears no analogy, in principle, to the case in hand. In that case there was no express power of expulsion conferred in the charter, and the decision rested wholly upon the ground that the offense was not such as fell within the inherent powers of the corporation at common law. The common law power of expulsion, as declared in the opinion of Chief Justice Woodward, who tried the case at nisi prius, may be stated thus:

1. The power of disfranchisement must, in general, be conferred by the charter; it is not sustained as an incidental power, excepting, first, when the member has been legally convicted of an infamous offense, or, second, when he has committed some act tending to the destruction or injury of the society.

2. The power to make by-laws is incidental to corporations, but is generally conferred by charter; by-laws, however, which vest in a majority the power of expulsion for minor offenses are void, and expulsion under them will not be sustained.

3. In joint-stock companies, or corporations owning property, no power of expulsion can be exercised, unless conferred by statute.

On error to this court these rulings at nisi prius were affirmed by a divided court. Evans had been convicted of breaking the 65th article of the by-laws of the club, by having an altercation within the walls of the club house with Samuel R. Thomas, and by striking him a blow. "I look upon the occurrence," says the chief justice, "as disorderly and injurious to the club, within the meaning of the 65th by-law, but as one of those minor offenses," etc., "for which a majority have no power even, under the by-laws, to disfranchise a member; and upon the doctrine of the cases I have referred to, I hold the by-law void, so far as it inflicts this extreme penalty for such an offense. I would be very sorry to say that anything short of a statute could confer on a majority of the members of any corporation power to expel a fellow member for merely disorderly conduct." "It is not a joint-stock company at present, for under its by-laws no pecuniary profits are divisible among the members, but it may become so, and whether it does or not, the relator has a vested interest in its estate, and cannot be deprived of it by the proceedings that were had against him. On this point the authorities are clear and without conflict. Nothing but an express power in the charter can authorize a money corporation to throw overboard one of its members. I have shown that the Act of Incorporation contained no such power. On the contrary, it excluded it, for the proviso reads 'that nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to authorize the Philadelphia Association & Reading Room to do any other act or acts, in their corporate capacity, than are herein expressed.'"

These excerpts drawn from the opinion of the chief justice show that, whilst he denied the common-law power of a corporation to disfranchise its members, with the exceptions stated, he conceded that where the power is conferred by the charter it may be exercised even for minor offenses and in money corporations. The Union League, although not a proprietary corporation, cannot in any strict sense be considered a joint-stock or moneyed corporation; its object and purposes, as well as its management, are of a purely patriotic and social, and not a financial or monetary, character. Although authorized to hold property, real and personal, to a certain limited extent, for the promotion of the objects of the League, it is plainly distinguishable from such corporations as are organized for business and for purposes of gain; and this is fully illustrated in the present conduct of its affairs. In the by-laws it is provided that "no member shall receive any profit, salary or emolument from the funds of the League." Members are admitted, not upon payment of the estimated value of a share or interest in the property of the League, but of a merely nominal sum as an admittance fee, and are charged with the payment of an annual tax of $25 for the support of the League, whilst their franchise and property rights are not inheritable but continue for life, or during membership, only. But however this may be, the power of expulsion is expressly conferred by the charter, and the causes which shall justify it, and the manner of effecting the same, are expressly committed to the corporation, to be regulated by the by-laws, which by-laws, "the corporation and its officers are empowered to make, and alter, in the manner therein mentioned." It is plain, also, that according to the by laws made under this provision of the charter, a majority of the board of directors has the power to suspend a member for acts and conduct which they may deem disorderly, or injurious to the interests, or hostile to the object, of the League, "and this suspension, unless the member is subsequently restored, is equivalent to an expulsion."

It is contended, however, that this provision of the charter, and of the by-laws, is illegal and void, inasmuch as the personal franchise and property rights of each individual member are subject to the action of a majority. We cannot see, nor has it been suggested, how this section of the charter can be said to be in conflict with the Constitution of the State or of the United States; and if it is not, it is more difficult to see how that may be said to be unlawful which the law-making power of the State has expressly declared to be lawful. The relator, at the time of his admission to the League, was bound to know the provisions of the charter and will be held to have assented to its provisions and to the frame of government which was lawfully set up in accordance therewith. By the terms of his admission, the relator voluntarily submitted himself, as to all matters pertaining to the government of the League, to the action of the board, and of the majority; and he could not thereby have been deprived of any constitutional or legal right, for the tribunal was practically one of his own selection.

In the cases of Dutcher Ben. Assn., 35 Pa. 151, and 35 Pa. 208, and Beneficial Assn. of Brotherly Unity, 35 Pa. 209, applications for charters under the Act of 1863 were refused by this court, for the reason that the provisions of their proposed charters gave entirely indefinite power over its members, and, as this was supposed to be incompatible with the spirit of our institutions, the charters were refused, but if they had been granted no one can doubt that the powers conferred, if exercised in a reasonable manner, and not arbitrarily or capriciously, would have been sustained. Here, however, we have a legislative charter accepted and acted upon; the powers of the corporation have vested and it only remains for us to inquire whether these powers have been exercised in a proper and legal manner.

The case bears a closer analogy to Society for Visitation of Sick v. Com., 53 Pa. 126, where the corporation held a charter under the Act of 1791, in which the general power of expulsion was conferred, with the right to enact by-laws, and to alter, amend and repeal the same. The objects of the society were, in case of sickness of a member, to visit and to console him, and to give him advice and assistance; in case of death, to bury him free of charge, and to assist the families of deceased members, according to the circumstances and available means of the society. The relator, Meyer, was convicted of "feigning himself sick without being so," and of "drawing relief after his recovery," which were offenses declared by the by-laws. It was held that the society had a clear right, under the charter, to pass sentence of expulsion for a violation of the by-laws, and, by reason of the nature of the offense, a like power at the common law. Speaking of the force and effect of the charter, Mr. Justice Agnew says: "Having the force and effect of law, by the provisions of the Act allowing the incorporation, it is no longer a subject of judicial inquiry as to the fitness of its objects, conditions and articles."

In Franklin Ben. Assn. v. Com., 10 Pa. 357, the society was organized under the Act of 1791 for mutual assistance in sickness, etc., and in order to provide against extraordinary perils, a by-law prohibited members from enlisting as soldiers in the army, and notwithstanding the general and manifest impolicy of such a provision it was said that in a proper case it might be sustained. Such an objection the court said would go to the legal existence of the association. If the articles were against the public policy, it belonged to the court, in the first instance, to withhold the certificate. And as the Legislature, by a direct statute, constituting the charter of the Union League, has expressly given to the members, themselves, the right, through their by-laws, to regulate the causes of expulsion and the manner of effecting the same, we cannot see why the right thus conferred may not be exercised. The wisdom or policy of the provision having been determined by the Legislature, it is not now the subject of judicial inquiry.

Now, in view of the very general and comprehensive powers thus conferred, and of the objects and purposes, conduct and management of the League, can we say that the by-laws, ordained pursuant to the charter, are unreasonable, arbitrary or oppressive, or that they violate any principle of natural justice? We see nothing unreasonable in a by-law of a club, consisting of gentlemen, who are associated for patriotic and social purposes, requiring the observance of a proper decorum and gentlemanly personal intercourse between the members whilst within the walls of the club house. The lack of such regulations would certainly tend to promote such disorder and discussion as would be fatal to the attainment of the objects of the association. Any villification of a member, or exhibition of personal rancor towards him, or the use of abusive or offensive epithets respecting him, especially in his presence and hearing, within the club house, is, without doubt, disorderly and injurious to the interests of the club. Nor is the by-law in question illegal, or in conflict with the charter, in this, that it does not designate and define the various and specific acts which will be deemed disorderly. To have anticipated in a by-law the various disorderly acts which might or could occur would have required the exercise of a very fertile imagination. Neither the statute nor the common law contains any such ridiculous detail. What is orderly, and what is disorderly, conduct, injurious to the interests and hostile to the objects of the League, must necessarily be determined by some proper tribunal, and the board of directors, to whom the practical management of its affairs is given, constitutes in the first instance the tribunal which the members have themselves set up to have and exercise jurisdiction over such offenses. When Mr. Burt became a member of the League, he voluntarily submitted himself to this jurisdiction; he was admitted upon the terms of the charter, with knowledge that he must submit to all such regulations as the by-laws might reasonably provide, and that for any willful violation or infraction thereof he was liable to be disfranchised.

The offense of which he was convicted, it is true, was a minor offense; not such as would have justified his expulsion at the common law, but such as justified the League, acting in good faith, in the exercise of the powers conferred by the charter, in imposing that sentence, and especially as the relator, on a previous occasion, had been suspended for an offense of a similar character, and was reinstated upon his promise of amendment, and his pledge that there would be no further cause of complaint. Nor is it wholly without significance that the counter-charge against Mr. Littleton was wholly groundless, unwarranted and untrue. It does not appear that the board of directors nor the League, in the exercise of their powers, either in the framing of these by-laws or in the trial and conviction of the defendant, acted arbitrarily or oppressively or in any sense unjustly, or that Arthur Burt was disfranchised without cause.

The League in the trial of this cause acted as a judicial tribunal. The offense charged, although a minor offense, was such as brought the relator within the jurisdiction; the trial was conducted in good faith and in due form, and the relator was convicted and sentenced in accordance with the law of the League, which we have said was in conformity with the charter. We may judge of the cause of the expulsion and of the form of the proceedings (Com. v. German Society, 15 Pa. 251), but we cannot review the case on its merits.

The relator's guilt of the offense charged is res judicata. The courts entertain jurisdiction to keep these tribunals in the line of order and to correct abuses, but they do not inquire into the merits of what has passed in res judicata, in a regular course of proceeding. Com. v. Pike Ben. Society, 8 Watts & S. 247; Toran v. Howard Ben. Assn. 4 Pa. 519.

"In Black and White Smiths Society v. Vandegte, 2 Whart. 812, Chief Justice Gibson asserted that the by-laws of a private corporation like the present derived their force from assent, either actual or constructive; and the party assenting to the charter is consequently bound by everything done in accordance with it, and when he has been regularly tried and expelled the sentence of the society, acting in a judicial capacity and within its jurisdiction, is not to be questioned collaterally, whilst unreversed by superior authority. 'If he have been expelled irregularly,' the chief justice adds, 'he has his remedy by mandamus to restore him, but neither by mandamus nor action can the merits of his expulsion be re-examined.'"

We quote from the opinion of Mr. Justice Agnew, in Society for Visitation of Sick v. Com., 53 Pa. 185, where the case in 2 Whart. 812, is followed and the same rule is recognized and approved. No case has been called to our attention in which a different rule is laid down.

We have made no reference to the English cases cited at the argument. The English clubs are not incorporated. They are formed under written articles of agreement, and the rules of law applicable thereto are somewhat different; for there, the members are held upon the footing of a personal contract, whereas in the case of a corporation, as we have already said, the courts will see that the powers conferred, and especially the power of expulsion, are not exercised in an oppressive or arbitrary manner, but in good faith and upon reasonable cause. We have confined our citations to our own cases, which, however, do not differ in any material respect from the cases elsewhere. One case has been brought to our attention, Pitcher v. Chicago Board of Trade, 20 Ill. App. 819, which appears to bear a very close analogy to the present. The board of trade was a body corporate, created by special Act of the Legislature. It owned a large amount of property. Its object was the promotion of trade, and the admission fee was $10,000. The corporation was authorized to establish such rules, regulations and by-laws for the management of their business, and the mode in which it should be transacted, as they might think proper, and had "the right to admit or expel such persons as they may see fit in manner to be prescribed by the rules, regulations and by-laws thereof." Pitcher was admitted as a member, and paid the price of admission, but was afterwards charged with "fraudulent conduct in a business transaction," an offense declared by the by-laws. He was tried before the board of directors under the by-laws, and, the charge being sustained, he was expelled. On a mandamus it was held that, as the charter conferred a general power of expulsion to be exercised as prescribed by the rules, regulations and by-laws, that power was such as could be delegated to the board of directors. "It seems to us," says Judge McAllister, who delivered the opinion, "from a consideration of all the provisions of the Act, that its framers intended to leave the whole subject matter of the expulsion of members to be regulated, both as to method and tribunal, by rules and by-laws of the body, not inconsistent with the principles of natural justice or the laws of the land. In pursuance of that power, the by-laws set out in our statement of the case were adopted, by which appellant on admission agreed to be bound. We are of opinion that such by-laws were authorized by the Act, are not inconsistent with any principle of natural justice or the laws of the land, and are valid; that the trial, conviction and expulsion of the appellant were by a tribunal, not only authorized by the appellee's charter, but by reason of appellant agreeing to be bound by said by-laws."

The case cited presents many points of similarity to the present case. The corporation, in both cases, owns property of large value; members were admitted on payment of a money consideration, the power of expulsion was in both instances conferred by charter and was delegated under the by-laws to the board of directors, not only as to the causes, but as to the manner of its exercise, and in neither case was the particular act or thing charged specifically set forth as an offense in the by-laws, but was, on the trial, so adjudged by the board of directors.

We are of opinion, after a careful examination of the whole case, that the learned court below erred in entering judgment for the plaintiff upon the demurrer.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and judgment is now entered for the defendant.

MEADVILLE WATER CO., Appt.

(....Pa....)

1. The purchase of land including a spring will not justify diverting the water flowing therefrom from its natural channel to supply a city with water.

NOTE.—Right of lower owner to flow of water.

As to running surface water, the owner can appropriate it to his own use, but he cannot so divert it as to prevent its use by those below him; and even where the water is running underground, if it flows in a natural channel known and ascertained by those deriving its benefits, it cannot be diverted to the injury of the riparian proprietors. Redman v. Forman, 20 Ky. 215.

The upper owner cannot vary the flow of the stream to the injury of the lower owner. See notes to Whitney v. Wheeler Cotton Mills, 7 L. R. A. 612; Jordan v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. (Minn.) 6 L. R. A. 578.

2. A defense in an action of trespass that plaintiff is a married woman, and has proved no title, and has no possession except as the wife of her husband, cannot avail where he testifies that the land belongs to her, and is thus estopped from claiming damages in another suit.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Crawford County in favor of plaintiff in an action of trespass to recover damages for the alleged wrongful diversion of a stream of water that formerly flowed over plaintiff's land. Affirmed.

Defendant denied its liability in this action, inter alia, upon the grounds that plaintiff was not the owner of the land alleged to have been damaged, and that she had no possession thereof except in the right of her husband.

At the trial plaintiff's husband admitted that she held the title to the land alleged to have been damaged by the diversion of the water.

The court affirmed plaintiff's point to the effect that if the water of the spring had been accustomed to flow across plaintiff's land, and had been diverted by defendant as charged, plaintiff could recover damages to the amount of the difference in the value of the use of the farm with the water in the stream and without it. (First assignment of error.)

Also that if defendant diverted the water without right or authority, punitive damages might be given. (Second assignment of error.)

The court denied defendant's point to the effect that, plaintiff having shown no title to the locus in quo, and her husband being admittedly in possession thereof, plaintiff could not recover on any title or possession. (Third assignment of error.)

Also one to the effect that defendant had the right to purchase the water in the spring, and if it did so, the taking and use of the water was not a wrong to the owner of lands on which any waste water from such spring had been wont to flow, and plaintiff was not entitled to recover. (Fourth assignment of error.)

Also one to the effect that under its deed of purchase defendant became the owner of the spring and thenceforth had a right to use the water therefrom for all lawful and necessary purposes, and, if in consequence of such use plaintiff as inferior owner was deprived of the flow of water over her land, it was an evil without remedy, and plaintiff could not recover. (Fifth assignment of error.)

Pearson, C. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We need not discuss the question presented by the second assignment for the reason that an examination of the testimony shows conclusively that the jury did not give punitive damages. The verdict ($41) is within the range of the undisputed testimony.

The remaining assignments refer to the charge of the court and the answers to points. It is not essential to consider them separately. We can better dispose of them by giving our view generally upon the law of the case.

This was an action of trespass brought by Mrs. Lord, a married woman, against the Meadville Water Company, to recover damages for the diversion of a stream of water which, before the injury complained of, flowed over her land. The Meadville Water Company, appellant, was incorporated under the Act of 1874, and it was alleged had the right of eminent domain for the purpose of supplying the City of Meadville with water. In order to aid in procuring such supply the Company, in the year 1888, purchased an acre of land near said city on which was a flowing spring of water, and carried the water from said spring to the city by means of pipes. The plaintiff owns land near this spring over which the water thereof was accustomed to flow prior to its diversion by the Company. She claims that it no longer flows there, and that by reason of its being diverted out of its natural channel she is deprived of its use for irrigation and other purposes. This suit was brought to recover damages for such injury.

The questions thus presented are not difficult of solution. By the purchase of this acre of land on which the spring is situate the Company acquired the rights of a riparian owner; neither more, neither less. What its rights as riparian owner are were sufficiently defined in the recent case of Haupt's Appeal, 125 Pa. 232, where it was said: "If the authority of the plaintiff were measured by its rights as riparian owner it would be slight enough. It might indeed use the water for the domestic purposes incident to the ten acres of land. If there was a tenant thereon he could use it for watering his stock and for household purposes; for any useful, necessary and proper purpose incident to the land itself, and essential to its enjoyment. But that the rights of a riparian owner would justify the plaintiff in carrying the water for miles out of its channel to supply the Borough of Ashland with water is a proposition so palpably erroneous that it would be a waste of time to discuss it."

So we say here. The purchase of the acre of land, including the spring, gave the Company the rights of a riparian owner. But such rights were not a justification for the diversion of the water from its natural channel to supply the City of Meadville. It was conceded upon the argument that the Company had the right to divert it under its power of eminent domain. But it has never exercised such right. To do so involves compensation to those who are or may be injured by such diversion. Compensation was not made nor security tendered.

While a city or borough, or a company having the right of eminent domain, may take a spring or stream of water to supply a municipality, it can only do so by making compensation to those who are deprived of the use of the water, as provided by the Constitution. A taking without compensation is a trespass, as much so as the taking of land by a railroad company to construct its road, without making compensation or filing a bond with security as provided by law. Where the power to take exists, it must be exercised according to law; if it is not, the corporation so taking becomes a trespasser, and may be proceeded against as such.

It is a mistake to assume that the purchase of this acre of land gave the Company an absolute right to the spring of water. The water did not pass by the deed beyond its reasonable use by the vendee as a riparian owner. As was said in Haupt's Appeal, supra: "There can be no such thing as ownership in flowing water; the riparian owner may use it as it flows; he may dip it up and become the owner by confining it in barrels or tanks, but so long as it flows it is as free to all as the light and air."

The Company might have taken this spring under its right of eminent domain if it possessed such right; for aught that appears it may do so still; and after having done so, and made compensation to the riparian owners who are injured thereby, it will be free from suits of this nature. Had it done so in this instance it would not have had this judgment against it.

We do not regard the question of the plaintiff's title, under the facts of the case, as of any importance. The plaintiff's husband testified that the farm belonged to her, and he is certainly estopped from recovering damages in another suit.

Judgment affirmed.

Philadelphia County in favor of defendant in an action to recover damages for acts committed by defendant's servants in breaking into and entering plaintiff's dwelling-house with force and violence, in violently seizing and taking away a certain cabinet organ, and in assaulting plaintiff's wife. Reversed.

The case fully appears in the opinion.

Mr. Peter Boyd, for appellant:

A master is ordinarily liable to answer in a civil suit for the tortious or wrongful acts of his servant, if those acts are done in the course of his employment in his master's service; the maxims applicable to such cases being respondent superior and qui facit per alium facit per se.

The test of the liability of the master for the tortious acts of his servant is not the instructions given to the servant, but the purpose of the employment.

As defendant was in no wise privy to the trespass or responsible for it, his neglect to return to the plaintiff his own property, which had been gotten from him by fraud, cannot make him responsible as a trespasser.

North v. Williams, 12 Cent. Rep. 340, 120 Pa. 100.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Dearborne is a dealer in cabinet organs and other musical instruments. It is his habit, and it seems to prevail quite generally among dealers in similar articles, to sell on the installment plan to those who desire it, taking an instrument in the nature of a lease from the purchaser. The several installments of purchase money are to be paid as rent. If they are paid, the article becomes the property of the so-called lessee. If not paid, the vendor reserves the right to seize and retain the article.

Fox was an employé of Dearborne, whose business was to hunt up instruments on which one or more installments were unpaid, whether in the hands of the original purchasers or their vendees, in order that they might be seized or replevied by Dearborne. He had sought and obtained admission to the house of McClung by means of falsehood, and secured the number and description of the cabinet organ in the parlor. His employer alleged that it was an instrument which he had sold or leased to a customer two or three years before, and on which unpaid installments were due. Fox expressed confidence in his ability to invade McClung's home a second time and bring off the organ without a breach of the peace. An expedition was fitted out, consisting of two men and a team, under the direction and control of Fox, for this purpose. Before they set out they were instructed by Dearborne not to commit an assault and battery on any person, and not to break the law. They went to McClung's house, secured admission to the parlor by a false pretense, and began the removal of the organ. Mrs. McClung and her son, who happened to be at home, tried to resist, but were at once overpowered, and the organ and its belongings carried off. The scene is described by one of the witnesses thus: "I came down and saw Mr. Fox. He was holding my mother up against the parlor door. I came forward, and my brother came out and asked what all this meant. He said, 'Just this, if you interfere with my business I will shoot you dead,' and reached in his back pocket . . . he said, 'I come to take this organ out of here. If you interfere with my business I will shoot you.' Then my brother said, 'You do not take this organ out of this house; show your authority. If you don't, you take it over my corpse.' . . . Then he clinched my brother. . . . Then the two colored men came in and began knocking us about. . . . I then went to the corner and saw a policeman, and asked him to come down. He came down, and Fox said arrest this man (meaning my brother), and I will appear against him in the morning. They arrested my brother, and he was taken to the station."

This action was brought by McClung to recover damages for this high-handed and hostile invasion of his home.

On the trial the learned judge of the court below told the jury that the conduct of Fox "was without mitigation, and deserving of the severest condemnation," but that whether Dearborne was responsible for it or not depended on the instructions he gave him when he started out on the expedition. The correctness of this instruction is the point on which this appeal depends. The general doctrine laid down by the learned judge that every man is liable for his own trespass only, must not be taken too literally, for one must be held to do that which he procures or directs another to do for him, as well as that which he does in his own person. Qui facit per alium facit per se. Servants and employes are often without the means to respond in damages for the injuries they may inflict on others by the ignorant, negligent or wanton manner in which they conduct the business of their employer. The loss must be borne in such cases by the innocent sufferer, or by him whose employment of an ignorant, careless or wanton servant has been the occasion of the injury; and under such circumstances it is just that the latter should bear the loss. But the master is not liable for the independent trespass of his servant. If a coachman, while driving along the street with his master's carriage, sees one against whom he bears ill will at the side of the street, and leaves the box to seek out and assault him, the master would not be liable. Such an act would be the willful and independent act of the coachman. It was done while in his master's service, but not in the course of that service. But if the coachman sees his enemy sitting on the box of another carriage driving along the same highway, and he so guides his own team as to bring the carriages into collision, whereby injury is done, the master is liable. The coachman was hired to drive his master's horses. He was doing the work he was employed to do, and for the manner of his doing it the master is liable. Wood, Mast. and Serv. 277.

It would be no defense to the master to prove that he had given his coachman orders to be careful, and not drive against others. It was his duty not only to give such orders, but to see that they were obeyed. It will be seen, therefore, that it is the character of the employment, and not the private instructions given by the master to his servant, that must determine the measure of his liability in any given case.

An excellent illustration is afforded by the case of Garratzen v. Duanehal, 30 Mo. 104. The defendant was a gunsmith. In his absence from his store a clerk was waiting upon a customer who wanted to buy a rifle. The customer desired to see it loaded, and would not buy unless this was done. The orders of the defendant to his clerk were that he should not load a rifle in the store. The customer was so earnest in desiring it that the clerk loaded it, and by accident it was discharged, the ball injuring the plaintiff, who was sitting at a window on the opposite side of the street. The defendant set up his orders to his clerk as a defense, but it did not prevail. The court said: "There is no pretense that the clerk was trying to do anything for himself. He was acting in pursuance of authority and trying to sell a gun, to make a bargain for his master, and in his eagerness to subserve his master's interests, he acted injudiciously and negligently."

In the case now before us, Dearborne sent Fox and his helpers to the house of McClung for the purpose of seizing and bringing away the organ. He says: "I told him to take the men and team when he was ready, and to bring the organ in, but to be careful and not to have any row about it." Black, who drove the team, testifies: "Mr. Dearborne told Fox to go down and get this organ on South Sixteenth Street; to get it as peaceably as possible, and not to have any assault and battery, or any disturbance whatever." These directions show that Dearborne knew that the errand on which he sent his employes was one that was likely to result in trouble, and would require to be managed with great coolness and care in order to avoid collision and a breach of the peace. But however the rule may be held in regard to the criminal liability of the master under such circumstances, it is very clear that he cannot escape liability civilly, by virtue of his instructions to his servant as to the manner of doing an act which the servant is to undertake on his behalf. He knew that the invasion of McClung's house in the manner contemplated was likely to excite indignation and resistance on the part of the inmates, and that what ought to be done might have to be determined under excitement, and without time for consultation or reflection by his employes. Under such circumstances he puts them in his own stead, and he is bound by what they do in the effort to do the thing which was committed to them. Sanford v. North Ave. R. Co. 20 N. Y. 343, Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Rosenwald, 113 Pa. 519, 4 Cent. Rep. 713; Pittsburgh, A. & M. P. R. Co. v. Donahue, 70 Pa. 119, Hays v. Millar, 77 Pa. 203; Garratzen v. Duanehal, supra.

The defendant was bound not only to give proper instructions to his servants when sending them on such an errand, but he was bound to see that his instructions were obeyed.

In the leading English case of Deymour v. Greenwood, 6 Hurl. & N. 303, referred to at some length in Wood on Master and Servant, § 207, it is said: "If the act is done within the scope of the servant's employment and is done in the master's service an action lies against the master and he is liable even though he has directed the servant to do nothing wrong."

Here Fox and his helpers were sent to bring away the organ. The acts complained of were committed in the course of, and as a means to, the accomplishment of that for which they were sent. Let it be conceded that they were instructed to do no wrong and that they did what they were warned not to do, the master is nevertheless liable. When he sends them upon an errand that exposes them to resistance and danger and the excitement consequent upon the presence of such a state of things, he must take the chances of their self-control and ability to obey. If he finds the risk inconveniently expensive he may conclude to respect the homes of inoffensive citizens and rely on his legal remedies for the recovery of any property to which he may claim title hereafter.

The jury should have been told that the defendant was liable for what the learned judge aptly characterized as an "unjustifiable outrage" by his employes, and they should have been allowed to assess adequate damages for the breach of the plaintiff's close, if the entry was forcible, and for all the injury done him by any and all the defendant's servants while engaged in the business of seizing and carrying away the organ. All the circumstances may be considered in fixing the compensation to be awarded to the plaintiff.

Judgment reversed, and a venire facias de novo awarded.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

George HANLEY et al.

v.

Hiram WALKER, Appt.

(....Mich....)

1. The certificate of architects which is, by a contract, made a condition precedent to the right to demand payment for labor performed, must be obtained before an action can be maintained on the contract, if the architects have not been guilty of fraud or collusion.

2. Recovery upon a quantum meruit cannot be based on a contract which makes a certificate of architects a condition precedent to a right of action, where the certificate has not been obtained.

3. Remedying the defects pointed out by architects, but not in the ways suggested by them, and without obtaining from them the certificate made by the contract a condition precedent to a right of action, cannot give a cause of action. Plaintiffs cannot substitute their own assertion, or the opinion of the jury, for the decision of the architects.

4. Taking possession of real estate, after work in constructing buildings has been done thereon, and the contractor has left the premises, and appropriating to the owner's use and benefit the labor and materials of the contractor, does not constitute an unequivocal acceptance of the work, although it may be taken into consideration in determining that matter.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wayne County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action to recover the contract price for certain labor and materials furnished by plaintiffs in plastering defendant's houses. Reversed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Atkinson, Carpenter, Brooks

& Haigh, with Mr. William Atkman, Jr., for defendant, appellant.

Mr. J. J. Speed for plaintiffs, appellees.

Champlin, C. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs composed the firm of George Hanley & Bro., who were house plasterers doing business in the City of Detroit. In 1888 defendant was building brick dwelling-houses situated upon John R. and Watson Streets, in the City of Detroit. They were five in number. On the 26th day of May, 1888, the plaintiffs entered into a contract with defendant to do the plastering in these houses according to certain plans and specifications then prepared for said work by William Scott & Co., architects, which plans and specifications were made a part of the contract. The plaintiffs were to furnish and provide all the good, proper and sufficient materials and labor of all kinds as should be necessary and sufficient for completing and finishing the whole of the lathing and plastering of the five dwelling houses, for the sum of $2,475. The contract contained this clause: "It is also agreed by and between the parties that the specifications and drawings are intended to co-operate, so that any works exhibited in the drawings and not mentioned in the specifications, or vice versa, are to be executed the same as if they were mentioned in the specifications and set forth in the drawings, to the true intent and meaning of the said drawings or specifications, without extra charge; and, should any dispute arise respecting the true construction or meaning of the drawings or specifications, the same shall be decided by William Scott & Co. and decision shall be final and conclusive." It also contained the following: "The contractor, at his own proper costs and charges, to provide all manner of labor, materials, apparatus, scaffolding, utensils and cartage, of every description, necessary for the due performance of the several works." The 8th article reads as follows: "Should the owner, at any time during the progress of said works, require any alteration of, deviation from, addition to or omissions in, this contract, consisting of this agreement and the said plans and specifications, made a part hereof, he shall have the right and power to make such change or changes, and the same shall in no way injuriously affect or avoid this agreement, but the difference shall be added to or deducted from the amount of this contract, as the case may be, by a fair and reasonable valuation. No changes shall be made except by written notice from the owner, which may be served on the contractor, sub contractor or foreman. No omission of work or materials from the plans or specifications shall be deemed extra work if the same is necessary to complete said building in accordance with the general design or purpose for which the same is intended, and the provisions of said plans and specifications, and no work shall in any case be considered extra unless a separate estimate, in writing, for the same shall have been submitted by the contractor to the architect and the owner, and their signatures obtained thereto; and should any dispute arise respecting the true value of any extra work, or of the works omitted by the contractor, the same shall be valued by two competent persons,—one to be chosen by the owner, and the other by the contractor,—and these two shall have the power to name the third, in case they cannot agree, and the decision of the two shall be binding on all parties in case there be no fraud or collusion."

The specifications required the first, second and third stories to be plastered with two coats,—the first of rich brown mortar; the second, excepting coves and splays, to be one hard coat white finish, with plenty of sand; finish composed of cold-run putty and plaster of paris, well mixed and put on,—troweled down hard and smooth. They also require the contractor to put up centers to cost \$15 net, in each house, to be selected by the owner or architect. The specifications also contained the following: "Parlors, halls, sitting and dining rooms, to have plaster coves as shown in sketch, rough plastered, and set with pebbles and shells, combed, as may be directed. Second-story halls, and two chambers in each house, to have nine splayed angles rough plastered and coarse combed. Plasterer to run $\frac{1}{4}$ in beads on angles of all plastered angles, and finish and set ornamental brackets. The plasterer will remove all rubbish, occasioned by his work from the premises, and leave the building broom clean; furnish and put up cotton cloth to the windows, where required; pay for all broken glass while he is performing his work, and furnish heat and labor for drying the plastering."

The contractor was to be paid from time to time, as the work progressed, upon the certificate of the architect, deducting 10 per cent until the whole job was completed and accepted, when the balance and such percentage was to be paid on the architect's certificate after the expiration of thirty days after acceptance and approval by the architect and owner, and the full, satisfactory adjustment of all things pertaining thereto. The contract relative to payment contained this proviso: "That before each and every payment is made a certificate shall be obtained from and signed by William Scott & Co., architects, to the effect that the work has been done, and materials have been furnished, in strict accordance with this agreement, said drawings and specifications, and that he considers the payment properly due. Said certificate, however, is in no way to lessen the total and final responsibility of said contractor."

No time is stated in the contract when the work shall be begun, nor when it shall be completed. Two facts, however, are suggested by the contract: First That the buildings were not then so far completed as to be in readiness for plastering. This is apparent from the fact that the contract stipulates that Hanley & Bro. shall build the houses, and furnish all material therefor. But this is not claimed, and explanation is found in the fact that a blank form of building contract was used in making the agreement for plastering. Second. The specifications show that the plastering might not be performed until cold weather, as they provide that the contractor shall "furnish heat and labor for drying the plastering." Hence it appears that it was in the contemplation of the parties, on the 20th of May, that the work would be done when the season would require artificial heat to dry the plastering.

The plaintiffs claim that there were two modifications of the written contract: First. On account of delay of the builders, the dwellings were not ready for the plasterers until late in the season of 1886. The plaintiff George Hanley testifies that they entered upon the performance of the contract about the middle or last of October; that he had a conversation with defendant about the 1st of October, in which, after mentioning the cause of delay, he said: "We are into the cold weather and we will have to provide some means of heating;" and he asked me to suggest something to get over the difficulty. I told him that the only way we could do it now would be by using salamanders and coke fires until such times as he would be able to get his proper heating arrangements in shape, and he said he would furnish the coke if I would supply the salamanders. He asked me if I could not make our mortar in the cellar, in order to protect it from the weather. I told him it was not necessary; that we could do it outside as well." He further testified that salamanders were fit only for use in drying out the brown coat, that it is not usual to use them during the progress of the second coat, as it has a tendency to discolor the work; and that he did not use them in this work for that reason. He testified that the second coat was put on after the first coat was dry. From the testimony of Mr. Hanley, it appears that no modification whatever was made in the terms of the contract except that Mr. Walker agreed to furnish coke for the heating, which relieved Mr. Hanley of that expense. The other modification claimed by Mr. Hanley to have been made was in reference to the manner in which the coves were to be finished. The testimony of Mr. Hanley in support of this claim is as follows: "The coves were not put in according to specifications. They were finished in soap-stone, by an arrangement with Mr. Crittenden. I considered that Mr. Crittenden was acting for Mr. Walker in his absence. Previous to Mr. Walker going away, I had an interview with him, and he said to me that anything I needed, to call down and see Mr. Crittenden, and, if there was anything I wanted an explanation about, to come down there and have a talk with Mr. Crittenden. He was in Mr. Walker's office, and apparently in charge of the office business,—book-keeping, or something of that kind. I called Mr. Crittenden's attention to what would be the appearance of the work if put in according to specifications. So we finished the cove in soap-stone, according to the specimen furnished to Mr. Crittenden. . . . I told Mr. Crittenden that, while soap-stone was more costly work, as Mr. Walker was away, I would not charge anything additional for the change." On cross-examination he testified: "Mr. Walker did not say anything to me with regard to Mr. Crittenden's agency. He merely said, if I needed anything to go down and see him. That was in the latter part of November, as near as I can recollect; just before Mr. Walker went west."

The defendant testified in his own behalf that he never authorized any change in the plans and specifications. He claims that the work was not done according to the contract. That the last coat was not hard finish, but would rub off when touched, leaving a white powder upon the hand, and that the cove and finish were not in accordance with the specifications. On the 23d of February, 1887, Scott & Co., architects, served notice upon plaintiffs that the plastering would not be accepted; that the surface rubbed off; that there was some defect in the last coat, or the frost had touched it, that, in order to make a good job, it would be necessary to calkmain the entire walls. On receipt of this notice, plaintiff sent his men; and they sponged the walls, and claimed that they left them in good order. They received another notice that they had overlooked some places, and they sent men and sponged these off and heard no more complaint until they called upon defendant to settle, who then claimed that the defect in the walls still existed, and that the cove work was not according to specifications. The plaintiffs admit payment to them of $1,000, but at what time it was made does not appear from the record.

The contract and specifications were introduced by the plaintiffs upon the trial; and the most important question in the case is raised by the eighth request of defendant, that the court instruct the jury as follows: "Under the contract in evidence, it is provided that, before any payment can be demanded by plaintiffs, they shall obtain a certificate from the architect. This they have not obtained, and your verdict should therefore be for the defendant." It is claimed by defendant's counsel that the failure of plaintiffs to complete the work to the satisfaction of the architect, and procure his certificate, is a complete defense to this action. I think the point is well taken. There is no claim upon this record that the architects have been guilty of any fraud, or that there had been any collusion between them and the defendant. There is no pretense that the plaintiffs have applied to or requested the certificate required by the contract.

When parties capable of contracting have deliberately entered into a written agreement in which, by all just rules of construction, the certificate of the architects is made a condition precedent to a right of action, such condition must be performed or its requirements waived. The authorities holding contracts like the one in question here valid are numerous. Leake, Cont. 2d ed. § 640; Benjamin, Sales, 3d Am. ed. § 575, Morgan v. Burns, 8 Bing 673; Grafton v. Eastern Counties R. Co., 8 Exch 600, Clarke v. Watson, 18 C. B. N. S. 278, Goodyear v. Weymouth & Melcombe Regis., 1 Har. & R. 87; Ferguson v. Galt, 25 U. C. C. P. 60, Smith v. Briggs, 3 Denio, 73, North Lebanon R. Co. v. McGraw, 88 Pa. 530; Reynolds v. Caldwell, 51 Pa. 208; O'Reilly v. Kerns, 58 Pa. 214, Gray v. New Jersey Cent. R. Co., 11 Hun, 70, Tyler v. Ames, 6 Linn. 280; Spring v. Ansonia Clock Co., 24 Hun, 173; Smith v. Brady, 17 N. Y. 173, Wycherly v. Meyers, 44 N. Y. 143, Wangler v. Swift, 60 N. Y. 38, Tate v. Butterfield, 84 Wis. 246; Kirtland v. Moore, 40 N. J. Eq. 106, 1 Cent. Rep. 400, Hot Springs R. Co. v. Maher, 48 Ark. 523; Stoss v. Heinsler, 120 Ill. 433, 6 West. Rep. 441, Brettler v. Tendick, 5 L. R. A. 270, 73 Tex. 439; Byrns v. Sisters of Charity of St. Elizabeth, 45 N. J. L. 213, Elliott v. Royal Ench. Assur. Co., L. R. 2 Exch 243.

It has also been held that if the certificate is required to be in writing there can be no parol approval. Lamprell v. Billerica Union, 3 Exch. 268; Russell v. Bandeira, 13 C. B. N. S. 149; Goodyear v. Weymouth & Melcombe Regis., supra.

Upon this point the authorities are not uniform, and we are not called upon to decide it in this case.

It is the settled law in this State that when a party fails to comply substantially with an agreement, unless it is apportionable, he cannot sue upon the agreement or recover upon it at all. But when anything has been done from which the other party has received substantial benefit, and which he has appropriated, a recovery may be had upon a quantum meruit based on that benefit. And the basis of this recovery is not the original contract, but a new, implied agreement deducible from the delivery and acceptance of some valuable service or thing. Allen v. McKibbin, 5 Mich. 454.

The plaintiffs appeal to this principle, and claim that they are entitled to recover, under the common counts, although they have not obtained the certificate of the architects; and they rely upon Widley v. Fractional School Dist. No. 1, 25 Mich. 422, in which this court held that the architect was not made the sole inspector or judge of the work as it progressed, but that a superintendent was expected to be, and was in fact, chosen by the district, and that it was a reasonable inference that the superintendent was expected to supervise the work as it progressed, and to express his dissatisfaction with any portion not in compliance with the specifications. His powers were made, by the contract, as broad as those of the architect, and there was no consent in the contract that his decision should be subject to reversal or review by his nominal superior; and for that reason it was held that whatever passed under his inspection as the work progressed, and was in good faith approved by him, expressly or by implication, was not open to objection on the part of the defendant afterwards, and that as to so much of the work, at least the plaintiff had the same right to recover that he would have had if the proper certificate had been furnished him. And it was also said that, "in a clear case, where the contractor had undertaken, in defiance of the superintendent, to force upon the district one thing, where they had bargained for another,—as, for instance, one kind of roof where another was agreed for,—unless there was a subsequent assent to accept it, express or implied, we do not think the district would be held liable to pay for the thing substituted at all. The district is not to be forced to take what it never wanted or bargained for, on any pretense that it will answer their purpose as well, or that, even if it will not, it is still of some value, and should be paid for accordingly." I do not think the case of Widley v. Fractional School District No. 1 is an authority in support of plaintiff's contention. The facts are entirely different. Here there was no superintendent, aside from the architects, agreed upon, and no approval, express or implied, of the architects of the work as it progressed, or after it was completed. It is true that, as to the right of a party, in general, to recover upon the common counts, subject to a recoupment of damages, when he has not strictly complied with his contract, the court expressed its adherence to the views expressed in Allen v. McKibbin; but the right does not exist in all cases, as was explained in that case, and more particularly in the later cases Martus v. Houck, 90 Mich 481; Priddy v. Bailey, 48 Mich 100.

In Martus v. Houck we stated what was held in Widley v. Fractional School Dist. No. 1, and upon page 480 the same judge who wrote the opinion in that case, referring to it, said, "We held, explicitly, that one contracting for a building to be put up according to certain specifications had a right to have what he bargained for. Unimportant variances may be overlooked or compensated for under a variety of circumstances which are not in question here, but departures from the contract which are susceptible of correction no one can be compelled to overlook or waive. Protection to equities cannot require it, and the acceptance of such a doctrine as the plaintiff here insists upon would take from an unscrupulous contractor the chief inducement to keep his promise. What is it to him whether or not he lives up to his agreement, if in any event he may collect for such performance as he tenders, and if the party contracting with him has no choice but to take at some price the building the contractor has seen fit to put up? The sanction the law would give to contracts under such a doctrine would, as nearly as possible, be worthless."

These parties are bound by the contract they entered into. The plaintiffs agreed to do the work, strictly in accordance with the plans and specifications, for a round sum. The defendant agreed to pay plaintiffs from time to time, as the work progressed, upon the plaintiffs obtaining a certificate from the architects, deducting 10 per cent, until the job was completed and accepted. The balance and such percentage was to be paid, on the architects' certificate, after the expiration of thirty days after acceptance and approval by the architects and owner; and before each and every payment should be made a certificate was to be obtained from and signed by William Scott & Co., architects, to the effect that the work has been done, and materials have been furnished, in strict accordance with the agreement, drawings and specifications, and that he considers the payment properly due. The fact is undisputed that the plaintiffs have not obtained the certificate required by the contract. They have not applied to the architects for such certificate. They have not obtained the approval or acceptance by the architects of the work. They have not performed it according to its terms. On the contrary, they were notified by the architects that it was not completed according to its terms, and certain defects were pointed out. These defects the plaintiffs claim to have been remedied. This is disputed by defendant. But, if plaintiffs did remedy the defects, they did not do so in the ways suggested by the architects, and they never have obtained the certificate of the architects after they claim the defects were remedied. The plaintiffs' assertion that they had remedied the defects did not give them a right of action. They could not substitute their assertion for the architects' certificate agreed upon between the parties, nor could they change the condition under which the defendant agreed to pay the balance thirty days after the architects' certificate of approval, and of its being completed according to the contract, to an agreement to pay without the certificate, and on their own assertion that it was completed according to contract. As was said in Clarke v. Watson, 18 C. R. N. S. 335: "This is, in effect, an attempt on the part of the plaintiff to take from the defendants the protection of their architects, and to substitute for it the opinion of a jury."

The principles laid down in Allen v. McKibbin do not apply to cases where the parties have by their agreement made some act or fact a condition precedent to payment, unless the other party has waived the condition. The waiver may be express, or it may be implied from facts and circumstances, as where the party relying upon the condition has accepted or appropriated the property or fruits of the other party. There is no evidence in the record before us that can be construed into a waiver of the conditions precedent contained in the contract on the part of the defendant. When a person contracts with another to build, or to do some portions of the work in constructing buildings upon real estate belonging to the owner of such real estate, his taking possession after the other has left the premises cannot be construed as an unequivocal acceptance, although he thereby takes possession of, and appropriates to his use and benefit, the labor or materials of the contractor. He must do so, as a matter of necessity, in many cases, or suffer the property to stand idle and unused, to the great detriment of all parties, and especially so of the owner. The most that can be said, in such cases, is that the acts of the party, and all the circumstances, may be taken into consideration in the determination of the question whether there is an implied waiver of the condition precedent. Under the testimony appearing in this record, the fact of the defendant's taking possession was not such an acceptance as relieved the plaintiffs from the terms and conditions of the contract requiring them to obtain the architects' certificate before they were entitled to payment.

As there must be a new trial, it may be well to notice one other matter of controversy between the parties, and that is with reference to substituting the soap-stone finish in the coves for pebbles and shells, as required by the specifications. This substitution cannot be held to have been made with the owner's consent previously obtained. Mr. Crittenden was not defendant's agent for the purpose of making changes in the plans and specifications, and no authority was shown for him to do so. The contract provided that such changes should be made in writing signed by the owner and architect. The change was not made in writing, and Mr. Crittenden was neither owner nor architect. Whether this provision of the contract had been waived, and the substitution ratified, will be, upon a future trial, a question of fact, under all the circumstances, to be submitted to the jury. If any question exists as to what the specifications require, the contract provides that the architects shall determine as to their meaning; and this power cannot be taken away from the architects agreed upon, and left to the construction of other plasterers or architects. The court erred in permitting this to be done upon the trial.

The judgment must be reversed, and a new trial is ordered.

The other Justices concurred.

Constructive notice by possession.

Actual possession of land is constructive notice of ownership, or of an interest, and is sufficient to put creditors and purchasers on inquiry. Bright v. Buckman, 30 Fed. Rep. 242.

But this never extends beyond the rights of the occupant and those under whom he claims. Roll v. Res, 11 Cent. Rep. 302, 40 N. J. L. 264.

The possession of land is notice to all the world of the possessor's rights thereunder. Lipp v. South Omaha Land Syndicate, 34 Neb. 632.

Every person dealing with land must take notice of an actual, open and exclusive possession, and when this, concurring with interest in the possessor, makes it homestead, a lender on security of the land stands charged with notice of that fact; and it is immaterial what declarations to the contrary the borrower may make. Texas Land & L. Co. v. Blalock (Tax.) Feb. 11, 1890.

Possession by several purchasers of parcels of land mortgaged, claiming under contracts of purchase, some of whom have fenced and are cultivating their lots, while others have built and are living upon them, is sufficiently open and patent to put the mortgagee upon inquiry. Bright v. Buckman, supra.

But possession, under an unrecorded deed for title, of a part of the land described in the deed and not in dispute, is not notice of claim to that part in dispute. Wright v. Leaster, 71 Tex. 640.

Where a person did not occupy the whole of premises, but had actual exclusive possession of a distinct and separate portion thereof, both really and apparently independent and exclusive of any possession of that portion by the mortgagor, and inconsistent with an absolute and unqualified title and right of possession in the mortgagor, such possession is notice to the mortgagee. Barnett v. Wood, 55 Hun, 227.

That a vendor of land is allowed by the vendee to retain possession does not constitute constructive notice to a mortgagee of the vendee of fraud by the latter in purchasing the land of which the vendor was ignorant at the time of such possession and when the mortgage was executed. Matsenky v. Feldman (Wla.) Nov. 6, 1899.

Where one who knows of a prior unregistered deed of trust or mortgage procures a mortgage for his own benefit on the same property, which is registered first, he gets the first lien on the property, unless he used fraud to prevent the registration of the mortgage which is first in date. Traders Nat. Bank v. Lawrence Mfg. Co. 33 N. C. 322.

One who takes a mortgage of land from one having a legal title, and subject to a trust in favor of a person in possession, is chargeable, by the fact of such possession, with notice of the rights of the latter. Brooke v. Borden, 125 Pa. 470.

Occupancy of land under an unrecorded deed, which provides for a reconveyance on payment of a debt to the grantor, is notice to a subsequent purchaser. Baymour v. Hubbard (Vt.) April 12, 1893.

Possession by a tenant of the real owner under an unrecorded deed is sufficient to put a purchaser of the land upon inquiry as to the title. Levy v. Holberg (Minn.) April 21, 1893.

Rochester University*, 3 L. R. A. 734, 111 N. Y. 624.

The fact that the property in question is a tenement house has no proper bearing on the question. That fact cannot change the rule.

O'Brien, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 20d day of July, 1886, the plaintiff loaned to the defendant John E. Murphy the sum of $2,000 and took from him his bond, whereby he promised to pay the same, with interest semi-annually, in two years thereafter. On the same day, and as collateral security for the payment of the bond, Murphy and his wife executed, acknowledged and delivered to the plaintiff a mortgage upon certain real estate in the City of New York. The premises thus mortgaged consisted of a tenement building, or block, containing forty-three rooms or apartments, then occupied by twenty different occupants or families, as tenants from month to month, except that three of these apartments were occupied by the defendant Margaret Brady and her husband, who kept a liquor store in part of the building, and they occupied two living rooms in the rear of the store, the wife claiming to be the owner of the premises and collecting rents from the other tenants.

The plaintiff at the time he made the loan had no actual notice or knowledge of any title to the premises in Mrs. Brady, or any claim on her part to be the owner. When the first installment of interest became due upon the mortgage default was made, and the plaintiff brought this action to foreclose under a provision in the mortgage making the whole sum due upon default in the payment of the interest when due.

Margaret Brady, being in possession, was made a party to the action, and she answered, setting up the defense that prior to the execution and delivery of the plaintiff's mortgage, and on or about the 5th of May, 1886, she became the absolute owner in fee simple of the premises described in the complaint and in the mortgage and of the whole thereof, and that upon becoming such owner she took possession of the same, claiming to be the owner and actually owning the same; and that she has ever since continued in actual, open and notorious occupation and possession of the premises as such owner, and has ever since and still owns the same in fee simple.

The trial court found that in March, 1886, Margaret Brady employed one Michael J. Murphy, an attorney, to examine the title to the premises in question and purchase the same for her, and before May 7, 1886, she gave said Murphy, as her attorney, the sum of $6,700 to be used as part of the purchase money, that Murphy procured a contract for the sale of the premises to be made between Mary S. Trimble, who then owned the same, and his son, John E. Murphy, the defendant, in which contract the said John E. Murphy appeared to be the purchaser of the premises, that upon the execution of this contract about March 10, 1886, Michael J. Murphy paid to Mrs. Trimble part of the sum of $6,700 which he had received for that purpose from Mrs. Brady, and the rest of that sum was paid to her on the 7th of May, 1886; that the balance of the purchase price, namely, $10,000, was secured to be paid to Mrs. Trimble by a purchase-money mortgage; that on the same day the purchase price was thus paid, Mrs. Brady's lawyer took from Mrs. Trimble a deed of the premises to his son, John E. Murphy, and the deed was duly recorded on that day; that on the 1st of May, 1886, Mrs. Brady took possession of the premises under the contract, claiming to own the same, and has ever since remained in possession, and occupied the same herself and by her tenants; that she rented certain rooms in the building to tenants immediately thereafter; that she discharged the housekeeper, who had before that date rented the premises and collected the rents for Mrs. Trimble, and moved herself into the rooms formerly occupied by the housekeeper, and that she has received the rents ever since the 1st of May, 1886, that on the 5th of May of that year a deed conveying the premises to Mrs. Brady was executed and duly acknowledged by the defendant, John E. Murphy, and his wife, and by him delivered to his father, Michael J. Murphy, as agent and attorney for Mrs. Brady; that Murphy never had any interest in the premises, never paid any part of the consideration money, and never had possession of the same or any part thereof; that the said Michael J. Murphy retained the deed to Mrs. Brady in his possession until not later than the 25th of August, 1886, when he delivered the same to her, and the same was recorded by her on the 29th of August, 1886, subsequent to the execution, delivery and record of the plaintiff's mortgage.

The trial court held that Mrs. Brady's title and possession were sufficient to defeat any claim under the plaintiff's mortgage, and dismissed the complaint, and this judgment has been affirmed by the general term.

At the time of the execution and delivery of the mortgage to the plaintiff, the defendant, Mrs. Brady, was in the actual possession of the premises under a perfectly valid but unrecorded deed. Her title must therefore prevail as against the plaintiff. It matters not, so far as Mrs. Brady is concerned, that the plaintiff in good faith advanced his money upon an apparently perfect record title of the defendant, John E. Murphy. Nor is it of any consequence, so far as this question is concerned, whether the plaintiff was in fact ignorant of any right or claim of Mrs. Brady to the premises. It is enough that she was in possession under her deed and the contract of purchase, as that fact operated in law as notice to the plaintiff of all her rights.

It may be true, as has been argued by plaintiff's counsel, that when a party takes a conveyance of property situated as this was, occupied by numerous tenants, it would be inconvenient and difficult for him to ascertain the rights or interests that are claimed by all or any of them. But this circumstance cannot change the rule. Actual possession of real estate is sufficient notice to a person proposing to take a mortgage on the property, and to all the world, of the existence of any right which the person in possession is able to establish. Governor v. Lynch, 3 Paige, 300, 3 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 916; Hank of Orleans v. Pigg, 3

Barb. Ch. 318, 5 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 916; Meyer v. Hinman, 18 N. Y. 184; Tuttle v. Jackson, 6 Wend. 218; Union College v. Wheeler, 51 N. Y. 88, 98; Cucchi v. Allen, 57 N. Y. 517.

The circumstance that Mrs. Brady and her husband occupied the store and a living apartment in the building prior to the time that she went into possession under her contract of purchase as tenants under Mrs. Trimble, the then owner, cannot aid the plaintiff. It does not appear that he ever heard of that fact till after the commencement of this suit, and we cannot perceive how it would affect the result if he had. The trial court found that prior to making the loan the plaintiff was upon the premises for other purposes, and that then by making inquiry he could have ascertained the rights of Mrs. Brady in the property, and while the absence of such a finding would not change the result, it shows that the plaintiff's loss is to be attributed to his confidence in Murphy, who probably deceived him, and to his failure to take notice of Mrs. Brady's possession.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.
All concur.

v.

John M. FRANCIS et al., Respds.

1. The question of libel or no libel in a civil action is one of law which the court must decide, where the publication is admitted, and the words are unambiguous and admit of but one sense.
2. A publication stating that the teller of a bank had become mentally deranged from overwork, and while in this condition had made injurious statements in respect to the bank's affairs, which occasioned it trouble, is defamatory in a legal sense, constituting a libel per se, although it imputes no crime, and subjects him to no disgrace, reproach or obloquy, for the reason that its tendency is to subject him to a temporal loss by injuring him in his business, character and employment as a teller.
3. It is not a legal excuse that defamatory matter was published accidentally or inadvertently, or with good motives, and with an honest belief in its truth.

(April 14, 1882.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Third Department, affirming a judgment of the Rensselaer Circuit in favor of defendants in an action to recover damages for the publication of an alleged libel. Reversed.

NOTE.—Libel and slander; questions of law and of fact, in action.

Whether the publication as set out in the complaint is libelous per se is properly determined by the court on demurrer, notwithstanding the averment that it was made falsely, maliciously and with the intent to defame plaintiff. Trimble v. Anderson, 79 Ala. 514.

The questions of good faith, or belief in the truth of the statement, and the existence of actual malice, are for the jury. Hinman v. Hare, 6 Cent. Rep. 51, 104 N. Y. 641.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Mr. Matthew Hale, for appellant:

To state in writing that the plaintiff is insane, or that his mind is affected, is libelous.

See Odgers, Libel and Slander, p. 23; Southwick v. Stevens, 10 Johns. 443; Perkins v. Mitchell, 81 Barb. 461, 465.

The libelous words were clearly spoken of plaintiff as teller and tended to injure him by the statement that his mental condition was not entirely good, and the further statement that his statements when he was probably not responsible for what he said had caused some bad rumors and are actionable.

Townshend, Slander and Libel, § 181; Foulger v. Newcomb, L. R. 2 Exch. 327; Newell, Defamation, p. 168, § 1; Sanderson v. Caldwell, 45 N. Y. 396, 405; Crusikshank v. Gordon, 118 N. Y. 178.

Mr. R. A. Parmenter, for respondents:

The action for a libel injurious to business cannot be maintained in the absence of malice, or a willful purpose to inflict injury, and this must be shown.

Hovey v. Rubber Tip Pencil Co. 83 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Jones & S.) 522, affirmed, 57 N. Y. 119.

Within the definitions the publication complained of is not libelous unless made with a mischievous and malicious intent towards the person censured.

8 Kent, Com. 16 et seq.; People v. Crosswell, 8 Johns. Cas. 387, 354; Steele v. Southwick, 9 Johns. 214.

It is only where the words of the publication are not susceptible of being understood in any other than a libelous sense that the court is bound to determine its character as matter of law.

Snyder v. Andrews, 6 Barb. 48; Dexter v. Tabor, 12 Johns. 340; Van Rensselaer v. Dole, 1 Johns. Cas. 279; McKinley v. Rob. 20 Johns. 356; Holloway v. Turrell, 25 Wend. 333; Stanley v. Webb, 31 Barb. 143.

Andrews, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The alleged libelous publication, which is the subject of this action, was contained in the "Troy Times" of September 15, 1882, in an article written on the occasion of rumors of trouble in the financial condition of the Manufacturers' National Bank of Troy, of which the plaintiff was at the time of the publication, and for eighteen years prior thereto had been, teller. The rumors referred to had caused a "run" upon the bank, and it is claimed by the defendants, and it is the fair conclusion from the evidence, that the primary motive of the article was to allay public excitement on the subject.

It is for the jury to say whether or not there has been a publication referring to the plaintiff; whether or not it is malicious and false; and whether or not the sense and meaning are as charged. But if the publication is expressed in terms so clear and unambiguous that no circumstances are required to make it clearer, the better rule is that the question of libel or no libel is one of law to be determined by the court. Donaghue v. Gaffy, 3 New Eng. Rep. 546, 54 Conn. 357; Bourreson v. Detroit Evening Journal Co. 6 West. Rep. 151, 68 Mich. 636; Kedrolivansky v. Nisbaum, 79 Cal. 214.

That part of the publication charged to be libelous is as follows:

"Several weeks ago it was rumored that Amasa Moore, the teller of the bank, had tendered his resignation. Rumors at once began to circulate. A reporter inquired of Cashier Wellington if it was true that the teller had resigned, and received in reply the answer that Mr. Moore was on his vacation. More than this the cashier would not say. A rumor was circulated that Mr. Moore was suffering from overwork, and that his mental condition was not entirely good. Next came reports that Cashier Wellington was financially involved, and that the bank was in trouble. A Times reporter at once sought an interview with President Weed of the bank, and found him and Directors Morrison, Cowee, Bardwell and others in consultation. They said that the bank was entirely sound, with a clear surplus of $100,000, that there had been a little trouble in its affairs caused by the mental derangement of Teller Moore, and that the latter's statements, when he was probably not responsible for what he said, had caused some bad rumors."

The complaint is in the usual form and charges that the publication was false and malicious, made with intent to injure the plaintiff in his good name and credit in his occupation as bank teller, and to cause it to be believed that by reason of mental derangement he had become incompetent to discharge his duties and had caused injury to the bank, etc.

The court on the trial was requested by the plaintiff's counsel to rule as a question of law that the publication was libelous. The court refused, but submitted the question to the jury. The jury found a verdict for the defendants, and as the verdict may have proceeded upon the finding that the article was not libelous, the question is presented, whether it was per se libelous. If it was, the court erred in leaving the question to the jury. It is the settled law of this State that in a civil action for libel, where the publication is admitted and the words are unambiguous and admit of but one sense, the question of libel or no libel is one of law which the court must decide. Snyder v. Andrews, 6 Barb. 43; Matthaus v. Beach, 6 Sandf. 236; Hunt v. Bennett, 10 N. Y. 173; Lewis v. Chapman, 16 N. Y. 309; Kingsbury v. Bradstreet Co. 116 N. Y. 311, 36 N. Y. 5. R. 630.

Of course, an error in submitting the question to the jury would be harmless, if their finding that the publication was not libelous was in accordance with its legal character. The import of the article, so far as it bears upon the plaintiff, is plain and unequivocal. The words amount to a distinct affirmation: first, that the plaintiff was teller of the bank; second, that while acting in this capacity he became mentally deranged; third, that the derangement was caused by overwork; fourth, that while teller and suffering from this mental alienation, he made injurious statements in respect to the bank's affairs which occasioned it trouble.

The cases of actionable slander were defined by Chief Justice DeGrey in the leading case of Osborne v. Horne, 8 Wils. 177, and the classification made in that case has been generally followed in England and this country. According to this classification slanderous words are those which (1) import a charge of some punishable crime, or (2) impute some offensive disease which would tend to deprive a person of society, or (3) which tend to injure a party in his trade, occupation or business, or (4) which have produced some special damage.

Defamatory words, in common parlance, are such as impute some moral delinquency or some disreputable conduct to the person of whom they are spoken. Actions of slander for the most part are founded upon such imputations. But the action lies in some cases where the words impute no criminal offense, where no attack is made upon the moral character, nor any charge of personal dishonor. The first and larger class of actions are those brought for the vindication of reputation, in its strict sense, against damaging and calumnious aspersions. The other class falls, for the most part, at least, within the third specification in the opinion of Chief Justice DeGrey, of words which tend to injure one in his trade or occupation. The case of words affecting the credit of a trader, such as imputing bankruptcy or insolvency, is an illustration. The action is maintainable in such a case, although no fraud or dishonesty is charged, and although the words were spoken without actual malice. The law allows this form of action not only to protect a man's character as such, but to protect him in his occupation also against injurious imputations. It recognizes the right of a man to live and the necessity of labor, and will not permit one to assail by words the pecuniary credit of another, except at the peril, in case they are untrue, of answering in damages. The principle is clearly stated by Bayley, J., in Whittaker v. Bradley, 7 Dowl. & R. 649: "Whatever words have a tendency to hurt, or are calculated to prejudice, a man who seeks his livelihood by any trade or business, are actionable." Where proved to have been spoken in relation thereto, the action is supported, and unless the defendant shows a lawful excuse, the plaintiff is entitled to recover without allegation or proof of special damage, because both the falsity of the words, and resulting damage, are presumed. Croft v. Brits, 1 Saund. 243, note; Van Vechten v. Hopkins, 1 Am. Lead. Cas. 135.

The authorities tend to support the proposition that spoken words imputing insanity are actionable per se when spoken of one in his trade or occupation, but not otherwise without proof of special damage. Morgan v. Lingen, 8 L. T. N. S. 300; "Joanna" v. Burt, 6 Allen, 239.

The imputation of insanity in a written or printed publication is a fortiori libelous where it would constitute slander if the words were spoken. Written words are libelous in all cases where if spoken they would be actionable, but they may be libelous where they would not support an action for oral slander.

There are many definitions of libel. The one by Hamilton in his argument in People v. Croswell, 3 Johns. Cas. 336, viz.: "A censorious, or ridiculing writing, picture or sign, made with malicious intent towards government, magistrates or individuals," has been often referred to with approval. But unless the word "censorious" is given a much broader signification than strictly belongs to it, the definition would not seem to comprehend all cases of libelous words. The word "libel," as expounded in the cases, is not limited to written or printed words which defame a man, in the ordinary sense, or which impute blame or moral turpitude, or which criticize or censure him. In the case before referred to, words affecting a man injuriously in his trade or occupation may be libelous, although they convey no imputation upon his character. Words, says Starkie, are libelous if they affect a person in his profession, trade or business, "by imputing to him any kind of fraud, dishonesty, misconduct, incapacity, unfitness or want of any necessary qualification in the exercise thereof." Starkie, Slander and Libel, § 188.

The cases of libel founded upon the imputation of insanity are few. The declaration in Morgan v. Lingon, supra, contained a count for libel and also for verbal slander. The alleged libel was in a letter written by the defendant, in which he states that "he had no doubt the plaintiff's mind was affected, and that seriously," and also that "she had a delusion," etc. It appeared that the defendant had also orally stated, in substance, the same thing. It was claimed that the writing was justified. The plaintiff was a governess. Marlin, B., in summing up to the jury, said that "a statement in writing that a lady's mind is affected, and that seriously, is, without explanation, prima facie a libel." In respect to the slander, he said "he thought there was no evidence of special damage. The jury must therefore consider whether the defendant intended to use the expression he did with reference to the plaintiff's profession of governess."

In Parkins v. Mitchell, 81 Barb. 465, it was held to be libelous to publish of another "that he is insane and a fit person to be sent to the lunatic asylum,"—Emott, J., saying: "Upon this point the case is clear."

Hes v. Harney, 2 Barn. & C. 267, was an information for libel for publishing in a newspaper that the king "labored under mental insanity and that the writer communicated the fact from authority." The judge charged that the publication was a libel and the charge was held to be correct.

The foregoing are the only cases we have noticed upon the point whether a written imputation of insanity constitutes a libel. Several of the text-writers state that to charge in writing that a man is insane is libelous. Addison, Tria, 768; Townshend, Slander and Libel, § 177; Starkie, Slander and Libel, § 184; Osgood, Libel and Slander, § 28.

The publication now in question is not simply an assertion that the plaintiff is or has been affected with "mental derangement," disconnected with any special circumstances. The assertion was made to account for the trouble to which the bank had been subjected by reason of injurious statements made by the plaintiff while in its employment. Words to be actionable on the ground that they affect a man in his trade or occupation, must, as is said, touch him in such trade or occupation; that is, they must be shown, directly or by inference, to have been spoken of him in relation thereto, and to be such as would tend to prejudice him therein. Sanderson v. Caldwell, 45 N. Y. 406, and cases cited.

The publication did, we think, touch the plaintiff in respect to his occupation as bank teller. It imputed mental derangement while engaged in his business as teller, which affected him in the discharge of his duties. The words conveyed no imputation upon the plaintiff's honesty, fidelity or general capacity. They attributed to him a misfortune, brought upon him by an over-zealous application in his employment.

While the statement was calculated to excite sympathy and even respect for the plaintiff, it nevertheless was calculated also to injure him in his character and employment as a teller. On common understanding, mental derangement has usually a much more serious significance than mere physical disease. There can be no doubt that the imputation of insanity against a man employed in a position of trust and confidence, such as that of a bank teller, whether the insanity is temporary or not, although accompanied by the explanation that it was induced by overwork, is calculated to injure and prejudice him in that employment, and especially where the statement is added that in consequence of his conduct in that condition the bank had been involved in trouble. The directors of a bank would naturally hesitate to employ a person as teller whose mind had once given away under stress of similar duties, and run the risk of a recurrence of the malady. The publication was, we think, defamatory in a legal sense, although it imputed no crime and subjected the plaintiff to no disgrace, reproach or obloquy, for the reason that its tendency was to subject the plaintiff to temporal loss, and deprive him of those advantages and opportunities as a member of the community which are open to those who have both a sound mind and a sound body. The trial judge, therefore, erred in not ruling the question of libel as one of law. The evidence renders it clear that no actual injury to the plaintiff was intended by the defendants, but it is not a legal excuse that defamatory matter was published accidentally or inadvertently, or with good motives, and in an honest belief in its truth.

The judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted.

All concur.

Peckham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs commenced an action heretofore against two other persons named, respectively, Kipp and Munger, on account of the same transaction for which this action was brought against the above-named sole defendant. The character of the complaint in that action was before this court, and the case [Goodwin v. Griffe], is reported in the 89th of New York Reports, at page 629. The defendants in that case were charged with detaching and carrying away from the mill the machinery in question in that case and also in this, and using it for themselves. It was there held, upon a perusal of the complaint, that the action was of a nature ex contractu and not ex delicto, for the wrong done plaintiffs by the conversion of their property. As the defendants therein had not, after their conversion of it, them-he cannot recover back the consideration. Stevens v. Pierce (Mass.) Feb. 27, 1890.

Assuming that the transaction was fraudulent on the part of the defendant, three remedies were open to the plaintiff: (1) to rescind the contract, treating it as void by reason of the fraud; (2) to enforce the securities as they became due; or, (3) to sue for damages by reason of the fraud. A resort to either of the last two remedies would have been an affirmation of the contract, and consequently a bar to the remedy first suggested, because he could not rescind the contract after having elected to affirm it. Bowen v. Mandeville, 39 Hun, 44; Lloyd v. Brewster, 4 Paige, 537; Field v. Bland, 39 How. Pr. 33.

either sold or otherwise disposed of the property which they had acquired from the plaintiffs, the action of the receipt by defendants of money for the sale of the property, which ex ipso facto they ought to pay back to plaintiffs, and which they therefore impliedly promised to pay back, could not be indulged in, and the position of the parties would have been at one time the subject of some doubt, whether there was any foundation for the doctrine of an implied promise in such case, or any possibility of the waiver of the tort committed by the defendants in the conversion of the property.

In some of the States it has been denied, and such denial placed upon the ground that the property remained in the hands of the wrong doer, and therefore, no money having been received by him in fact, an implied promise to pay over money had and received by defendant to the plaintiff was did not and could not arise. Such was the case of Jones v. Beer, 5 Pick. 295. But the great weight of authority in this country is in favor of the right to waive the tort even in such case. If the wrong-doer has not sold the property, but still retains it, the plaintiff has the right to waive the tort and proceed upon an implied contract of sale to the wrong-doer himself, and in such event he is not charged as for money had and received by him to the use of the plaintiff. The contract implied is one to pay the value of the property as if it had been sold to the wrong-doer by the owner. If the transaction is thus held by the plaintiff as a sale, of course the title to the property passes to the wrong-doer when the plaintiff elects so to treat it. See Pom. Rem. 2d ed. § 507-509; Putnam v. Wiss, 1 Hill, 204, 240, and note by Mr. Hill; Bart v. Taylor, 5 Hill, 577, 584; Norden v. Jones, 28 Wis. 600, 605; Cummings v. Voss, 3 Hill, 268; Spoer v. Newell, Id. 207; Abbott v. Blomson, 66 Barb. 858.

We think this rule should be regarded as settled in this State. The reasons for the contrary holding are as well stated as they can be in the case above cited from Mass. (5 Pick.) and some of the cases looking in that direction in this State are cited in the opinion of Talcott, J., in the case reported in 66 Barb. supra. We think the better rule is to permit the plaintiff to elect, and to recover for goods sold, even though the tort-feasor has not himself disposed of the goods.

There is no doubt that the complaint in the former case, reported in 80 N. Y., proceeded upon the theory of a sale of the property to the defendants in that action, and it was so construed by this court, and we have no inclination to review the correctness of that decision. We have then the fact that the defendants in that action were sued by the plaintiffs herein upon an implied contract to pay the value of the property taken by them, as upon a sale thereof by plaintiffs to them.

The plaintiffs having treated the title to the property as having passed to the defendants in that suit by such sale, can the plaintiffs now maintain an action against another person who was not a party to that action, to recover damages from him for his alleged conversion of the same property, which conversion is founded upon his participation in the same acts which plaintiffs in the old suit have already treated as constituting a sale of the property? We think not. The judgment roll in the former action was received in evidence upon the trial of this case, against the objection of the plaintiffs, and notwithstanding the fact that the defendant herein was not a party to such action. It appears that all the facts surrounding the transaction as to the taking of the property were known to the plaintiffs at the time when they commenced their action on the implied contract of sale.

The plaintiffs objected to the introduction of the judgment roll as incompetent and immaterial, and that there was no such defense set up in the answer.

The plaintiffs claim that the admission of such judgment violated the well known general rule that a judgment is not binding upon any but parties and privies. We think the decision does not trench upon the rule in question. If the judgment had been introduced for the purpose of proving any fact adjudicated thereby, any fact in litigation therein, or which properly might have been so litigated, the rule would doubtless apply, and no such fact would or could be proved in favor of the defendant herein as against the plaintiffs by such judgment, because the defendant was not a party or privy to it. It was not by way of estoppel, however, that the judgment was admissible. It was admissible for the sole purpose of showing that the plaintiffs had elected to treat the taking of this property as a sale, and this was shown by a perusal of the complaint therein.

Any decisive act of the plaintiffs, with knowledge of all the facts, would determine their election in such a case as this. Singer v. Wood, 3 Johns. Ch. 416, 431.

The proof that an action of that nature had been in fact commenced would have been just as conclusive upon the plaintiffs upon the question of election (proof of knowledge of all the facts at that time being given), as would the judgment have been. It was not necessary that a judgment should follow upon the action thus commenced. In those cases where the commencement of an action has not been regarded as an election of remedies, the fact has appeared that the plaintiff at the time of its commencement was not aware of the facts which would have enabled him to elect, or at least it did not appear that he was acquainted with the facts when he commenced his action. Such is the case in Equitable Co-operative Laundry Co. v. Herres, 106 N. Y. 25, 4 Cent. Rep. 180. Here the plaintiffs knew all the facts when they sued the other defendants.

The case of Croswell v. Little, 116 N. Y. 207, 208, 5 L. R. A. 608, is to the effect that the commencement of the action, where all the facts are known, is conclusive evidence of an election. Judge Danforth in that case, in speaking of plaintiffs' election to affirm or avoid the contract therein spoken of, said the plaintiffs could affirm or rescind it. "They could not do both, and there must be a time when their election should be considered final. We think that time was when they commenced an action for the sum due under the contract." It was also held that the discontinuance of that action was immaterial. It was the fact that the plaintiffs once elected their remedy and acted affirm-tively upon such election that determined the issue. After that the option no longer existed, and it was of no consequence therefore whether the plaintiffs did or did not make their choice effective. When it becomes necessary to choose between inconsistent rights and remedies, the election will be final, and cannot be reconsidered even where no injury has been done by the choice, or would result from setting it aside. 2 Herman, Estoppel, 1172, § 1045.

The plaintiffs having by the commencement of their former action in effect sold this very property, it must follow that at the time of the commencement of this one they had no cause of action for a conversion in existence against the defendant herein. The transfer of the title did not depend upon the plaintiffs recovering satisfaction in such action for the purchase price. It was their election to treat the transaction as a sale which accomplished that result, and that election was proved by the complaint already referred to.

But it is urged that this election of the plaintiffs is not binding upon them in favor of the defendant herein, because it was only against the defendants in the other action that they made their election. It is said there is no case to be found where an election has been treated as binding in favor of a stranger to the transaction, and that the defendant herein is such stranger so far as the plaintiffs' transaction with the defendants in the other action is concerned.

I do not think this claim can be maintained. In the first place what is the nature of the plaintiffs' act in electing to consider the transaction as a sale? It is a decision or determination upon their part to, in effect, ratify and proclaim the lawfulness of the act of taking the property, and it is an assertion on the plaintiffs' part that in so doing the plaintiffs' interest in the property was purchased, and that thereby their whole title was transferred and they ceased to own any part of the property, and that those who took it impliedly promised the plaintiffs to pay them the value of their interest in such property. This being so, why does not such transfer of title bind the plaintiffs as to the whole world? Surely, the title which plaintiffs once had in the property cannot at the same time rest with them and pass to those who took it. If the title really once passed, that would be a fact actually existing, which anybody ought to have the right to prove if it became material in protecting his own rights, unless there were some equitable considerations in such case which should prevent it. I cannot see that any exist here.

With full knowledge of all the facts the plaintiffs deliberately elected to treat the transaction, in which this defendant's share was well known, as a sale of the property, and now they propose to recover from this defendant damages for the conversion by him of the very same property which they have already said they sold by virtue of the very transaction which they now claim amounted to a conversion of the property by this defendant.

Why should the defendant not be permitted to set up such sale as a complete defense to this action? The plaintiffs have done nothing by reason of defendant's acts which should estop him from setting up this defense. Their situation has not since been altered for the worse by anything the defendant has done. If not, then the fact that the plaintiffs sold the property by virtue of the transaction which they now seek to treat as a conversion of it by this defendant must and ought to operate as a perfect bar to the maintenance of this action. And this is not in the least upon the principle of equitable estoppel. It is upon the principle that the plaintiffs, by their own free choice, decided to sell the property, and having done so, it necessarily follows that they have no cause of action against defendant for an alleged conversion of the same property by the same acts which they had already treated as amounting to a sale.

In Conrow v. Little, 115 N. Y. 387, 5 L. R. A. 403, already cited, the plaintiffs' election to affirm the contract between them and Branscom, evidenced by their commencement of the attachment suit, was held conclusive upon them, and the defendants were permitted to take advantage of such election, although they were not parties or privies to the plaintiffs' suit against Branscom. The defendants were enabled to take advantage of it, because such election showed that the plaintiffs had affirmed their contract with Branscom, and the plaintiffs' suit against defendants Little could only be maintained upon the assumption that such contract had been rescinded. If the other suit had gone to judgment, would not such judgment have been admissible for the purpose of showing the naked fact of the election of plaintiffs to affirm the contract? I have no doubt of it.

In Pauler v. Bowry Sav. Bank, 113 N. Y. 450, 4 L. R. A. 145, we held that the action could not be maintained, because the plaintiff by suing the party to whom the bank had already wrongfully paid the money elected to regard such payment as rightfully made, and a cause of action against the bank to recover against it the amount of its former indebtedness to the plaintiff was held to have been forever abandoned because of such election.

In that case, in order to prove the fact of election, the defendant proved the commencement of the former action by the plaintiff, and it was proved, as we assume, by the production of the judgment roll in such former action. It was admissible for the same purpose for which the judgment was admissible in this case, viz., to prove the fact of the plaintiff's election to pursue a totally inconsistent remedy. The defendant was not precluded from availing itself of such defense, although it was neither a party nor privy to the judgment which proved the fact of such election.

In Bank of Batavia v. Beale, 34 N. Y. 473, the plaintiff put in evidence a judgment roll in which it was neither a party nor privy, to show that Sweet had made an election therein which bound him, and consequently the defendant Beale. This court held the judgment conclusively proved the election.

These views are fatal to the maintenance of this present action for a conversion against the defendant.

If the plaintiffs herein had commenced their action against this defendant, based upon an implied promise by him to pay the value of the property as upon a sale thereof to him in connection with the defendants in the other suit, a totally different question would have arisen, upon which we express no opinion. The plaintiffs in such action might urge that it ought to be sustained upon the ground that the defendant herein was one of the wrong-doers in the transaction resulting in the taking of this property, and that the tort therein committed by him and the defendants in the other suit was a joint and several one for which they were jointly and severally liable, and when the tort was waived by the plaintiffs and an implied contract was based upon such waiver the contract implied was of the same nature as the tort which was waived, and was a joint and several contract. Being a joint and several contract, an action against the other defendants upon their several contract, and a recovery of judgment without satisfaction, would constitute no defense to an action against this defendant, based upon his several and implied contract to pay the value of the property. There may be some authority for this course of reasoning.

City Nat. Bank v. National Park Bank, 89 Hun, 105.

We neither affirm nor deny its soundness, and only refer to it in order to repel any possible implication that in this decision we have held that no such action could be maintained. But even if such an action would lie, we cannot turn the present one for a conversion of the property into one to recover the value thereof as upon a sale to defendant. People v. Dennison, 84 N. Y. 272; Romeyn v. Sickles, 108 N. Y. 650, 11 Cent. Rep. 312.

As to the other ground of objection taken by the plaintiffs, we think the evidence was admissible for the reasons stated by the learned judge at general term.

Upon the whole case we are satisfied that no error was committed prejudicial to the plaintiffs, and the judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

All concur, Ruger, Ch. J., and Andrews, J., in result.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS (2d Div.)

Arthur TALAMO, Resp.,

v.

August SPITZMILLER, App.

(...N. Y....)

1. The mere fact that a person goes into possession under a parol lease, which is void because for a longer time than for one year, does not create a yearly tenancy, although payment of an aliquot part of the annual rent would be evidence of such tenancy.

2. A mere tenancy at will, subject to the payment of the stipulated rate of rent as for use and occupation, is created by going into possession under an oral lease for more than one year.

(March 18, 1890.)

NOTE.—Tenancy from year to year; how created.

A parol lease of real estate for the term of one year to commence in futuro is invalid. See Jellett v. Rhode (Minn.) 7 L. R. A. 671, and note.

A lease made December 15, 1887, for the year 1888, may be valid, although not in writing, under Miss. Code, § 1232, excepting from the necessity of writing a lease for not longer than one year. McCoy v. Toney, 2 L. R. A. 347, 65 Miss. 233.

A verbal lease of land for a longer term than one year, although invalid, may become a tenancy from year to year if the tenant enters under it, pays rent and remains longer than one year, with the assent of the landlord. Rosenblatt v. Perkins (Or.) 6 L. R. A. 237.

A lessee for a year at a fixed rent, who continues in possession thereafter, with no new arrangement, is a tenant from year to year, not a tenant at will. Second Nat. Bank v. The O. R. Merrill Co. 69 Wis. 501.

An entry into possession and payment of rent makes as a tenancy from year to year. Blumenthal v. Bloomingdale, 1 Cent. Rep. 514, 100 N. Y. 536.

Leases extending three years from the time of making shall have the force and effect of estates at will. Jennings v. McComb, 3 Cent. Rep. 176, 113 Pa. 518.

But renting for a year and holding over for two years is not a tenancy at will. State v. Fort, 24 S. C. 511.

The common-law presumption that, when a tenant for a year holds over with the consent of his landlord and pays rent, a tenancy from year to year is established, is overcome by Iowa Code, § 2014, providing that any person in the possession of real property with the consent of the owner is presumed § L. R. A.

to be a tenant at will until the contrary is shown. O'Brien v. Troxel, 75 Iowa, 760.

The fact that, after one ceased to be the pastor of a society, he was allowed to remain in possession of the parsonage, did not change his occupancy into a tenancy from year to year or even a tenancy at will, unless his possession was of such duration or under such circumstances as to warrant an inference of consent on the part of the society to a different holding from that which he formerly had. East Norway L. N. R. L. Church v. Frotalie, 37 Minn. 447.

Such tenancy is at least a tenancy at will. Goldsmith v. Wilson, 68 Iowa, 685.

When tenancy expires.

A tenancy from year to year of premises in a city, as well as of agricultural premises, expires at the end of the calendar year. Wilson v. Rodaman, 30 S. C. 210.

A lease for one year with the privilege of three years from a certain time is a lease from year to year, not exceeding three years, and the tenant may terminate it at the end of the second year by giving notice. Gillion v. Finley (Pa.) 11 Cent. Rep. 798.

How terminated.

To terminate an estate from year to year by notice requires the giving of such a notice as is prescribed in Or. Code Gen. Laws, § 2067. Rosenblatt v. Perkins (Or.) 6 L. R. A. 237.

The occupancy of premises at an agreed rent per month under a parol lease is a tenancy at will under Vt. Rev. Laws, § 1982; and a notice, before the termination of a year, that the rent would be increased per month, terminated it. Amaden v. Floyd, 6 New Eng. Rep. 354, 40 Vt. 382.

APPEAL by defendant by permission from a judgment of the General Term of the Superior Court of Buffalo affirming a judgment of the Trial Term in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover from defendant the amount realized by him from the sale of certain of plaintiff's personal property out of which defendant claimed the right to reimburse himself for certain rent which he alleged that he had paid for plaintiff's benefit. Affirmed.

The case is sufficiently stated in the opinion.

Mr. Charles B. Wheeler, for appellant:

It is not necessary in order to bind Talamo that the lease should run directly to him and be taken in his name to make him a tenant.

Van Schaick v. Third Ave. R. Co. 88 N. Y. 501.

The statute declaring that "every contract for the leasing for a longer period than one year" shall be void unless the same "be in writing and subscribed by the party by whom the lease or sale is to be made," has no application to this case.

The authority to bind Talamo by the lease may be conferred and shown by parol.

Worrall v. Munn, 8 N. Y. 249; Lawrence v. Taylor, 5 Hill, 107.

If Talamo is not a co-lessee of the house he nevertheless is a sub-tenant under Spitzmiller, and when he entered under a parol lease void by the Statute, and took possession with the consent of Spitzmiller, the occupation insured as a tenancy from year to year.

Cohn*, 48 Hun, 454; Schuyler v. Leggett, 2 Cow. 660; Kline v. Rickert, 8 Cow. 226; McAdam, Land. and T. p. 48.

Messrs. Quinby & Monds, for respondent:

Where there has been an agreement for a lease, and an occupation without payment of rent, the occupier is a mere tenant at will; although if he subsequently pays rent under that agreement, he thereby becomes tenant from year to year.

The law does not infer any particular contract from the mere fact of entry under an agreement for a future lease.

Waring v. King, 8 Mees. & W. 575.

If there be no payment of rent, or its equivalent, or other circumstances from which a tenancy can be implied, no such tenancy can be deemed to be created by the mere occupation of the party, nor can he be treated as tenant from year to year.

Bradley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action was brought to recover the proceeds of the sale made by the defendant of the plaintiff's goods. The defendant admits his liability to account to the plaintiff for the proceeds of such sale, and alleges several matters by way of counterclaim, which will be referred to so far as is essential to the determination of the questions presented for consideration on

A tenant at will, after notice to quit, has a reasonable time to vacate the premises and procure other accommodations, depending upon the circumstances. Ibid.

Where a tenant from year to year holds over after the termination of the term, and the landlord does some act recognizing him as tenant, the tenancy can only be terminated by the agreement of the parties, express or implied, or by notice given, six calendar months ending with the period of the year at which the tenancy commenced. Critchfield v. Remaley, 31 Neb. 178.

Effect of payment of rent.

A lease may be conveyed into a tenancy from year to year, by annual payment, etc. Whether this has been done is for the jury. Dunn v. Rothemel, 2 Cent. Rep. 561, 112 Pa. 272.

Where lands are leased to a tenant for one year for a stipulated rent reserved, and after the expiration of the lease the tenant, without further contract, remains in possession, and is recognized as a tenant by the landlord in the receipt of rent for another year, this will create a tenancy from year to year. Critchfield v. Remaley, 31 Neb. 178.

When a tenant enters under a lease for a term of years, improperly executed, and pays rent according to the terms thereof, the law will infer an intention to create a tenancy from year to year, upon the terms specified in the lease. Fougere v. Cohn, 48 Hun, 454.

this review. The trial court found that on March 18, 1882, by an agreement of lease in writing under seal, made by Catharine Dickman and defendant, she leased to him a dwelling-house for the term of five years from May 1, 1882, at the annual rent of $450 for the first year, and $500 for each subsequent year, payable in equal monthly installments in advance, which the defendant undertook to pay. That the defendant took such lease at the verbal instance and request of the plaintiff, and upon the unwritten understanding and agreement that they should jointly use and occupy the dwelling-house during the term mentioned in the lease; and that the plaintiff should pay to the defendant half the rent, that the defendant and the plaintiff went into the possession of the house in May, 1882, and jointly occupied it until in November following, when the plaintiff quit the house and has not since then occupied any portion of it; that the defendant has paid the monthly installments of rent as they fell due, and that the plaintiff has paid nothing to the defendant on account of the rent. The court allowed to the defendant against the plaintiff a sum equal to one half the rent for the period of the joint occupancy, six and a half months.

And upon the exception to the conclusion of the court that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the amount for which judgment was directed, arises the question whether the defendant was entitled to the allowance of a greater amount against the plaintiff than that given by the court, on account of the rent. The contention of the defendant's counsel is: (1) that the plaintiff became liable to pay the defendant one half the rent which the latter undertook by the lease to pay as the installments should become due, (2) that if not so, the plaintiff became a yearly tenant and was liable to the defendant for one half the amount of the rent for one year. The plaintiff not being a party to the lease assumed no legal obligation to pay rent for the term, as a lease for more than one year not in writing was void. 2 Rev. Stat. 135, §§ 6, 8.

The agreement between the parties and under which the plaintiff entered into joint occupancy with the defendant, being void, gave to the plaintiff no right and imposed upon the defendant no obligation to permit him to go into or remain in possession of any portion of the house, and unless he became a yearly tenant his liability was for use and occupation for the time only which he occupied. Thomas v. Nelson, 60 N. Y. 118.

The mere fact that a person goes into possession under a lease void because for a longer term than one year does not create a yearly tenancy. If he remains in possession with the consent of the landlord for more than one year under circumstances permitting the inference of his tenancy from year to year, the latter could treat him as such, and the tenant could not relieve himself from liability for rent up to the end of the current year. And the terms of the lease void as to duration of term would control in respect to the rent. Coudert v. Caba, 118 N. Y. 309, 28 N. Y. State Rep. 684.

The parol agreement for five years was not effectual to create a tenancy for one year. Nor did the mere fact that the plaintiff went into possession have that effect. He remained in occupation a part of one year only, and the creation of a tenancy for a year was dependent upon something further. While it is not required that a new contract be made in express terms, there must be something from which it may be inferred, something which tends to show that it is within the intention of the parties. The payment and receipt of an installment or aliquot part of the annual rent is evidence of such understanding, and goes in support of a yearly tenancy, and without explanation to the contrary it is controlling evidence for that purpose. Cox v. Bent, 5 Bing. 185; Bishop v. Howard, 2 Barn. & C. 100; Braythwaite v. Hitchcock, 10 Mees. & W. 494; Mann v. Longley, Ryan & M. 335; Thomas v. Packer, 1 Hurst. & N. 672; Lord v. Orago, 6 C. B. 80.

While there may appear to have been some confusion in the cases in this State upon the subject, this doctrine has been more recently recognized. Ryder v. Syre, 70 N. Y. 184; Laughran v. Smith, 78 N. Y. 209.

In the cases last cited, the tenants had been in possession more than a year when the question arose, but having gone into occupancy under an invalid lease, their yearly tenancy was held dependent upon a new contract, which might be implied from the payment and acceptance of rent, and when once created could be terminated by either party without the consent of the other, only at the end of a year. The contention, therefore, that by force of the original agreement between the parties, aided by the fact that the plaintiff went into the possession with the consent of the defendant, is not alone sufficient to support an inference of the new contract requisite to create a yearly tenancy. The plaintiff paid no rent, nor while he was in possession was any request of or promise by him made to pay any. He simply went in under the original void agreement, and left within the year. There was no evidence to require the conclusion of the trial court that the plaintiff had assumed any relation to the premises, which charged him with liability other than for use and occupation, during the time he remained in possession. The defendant's counsel, to support his proposition that the entry by the plaintiff with the consent of the defendant made him a yearly tenant, cites Crane v. Christian U. Pub. Co., 17 Hun, 810, where it was remarked that a parol lease for a longer term than one year "operated so as to create a tenancy from year to year." If that was intended by the learned justice as a suggestion that such a void lease operated as a demise for one year, it is not in harmony with the view of the court in Laughran v. Smith, supra. That remark in the Crane Case was not essential to the determination there made, as rent was in fact paid for a portion of the term, nor can it be assumed that it was intended to have the import sought to be given to it. It must be assumed, upon authority and reason, that a parol lease for more than one year is ineffectual to vest any term whatever in the lessee named, and that when he goes into possession under it with the consent of the lessor without any further agreement, he is a tenant at will merely, subject to liability to pay at the rate of the stipulated rent as for use and occupation. Berlow v. Wainwright, 22 Vt. 88.

This may be converted into a yearly tenancy by a new contract, which may be implied from circumstances when they permit it. While the mere entry with consent will not alone justify it, a promise to pay and a purpose manifested to accept a portion of the annual rent provided for by the agreement may, as evidence, go in support of such a new contract.

The promise of the plaintiff to pay one half the rent was made preliminary to his entry, and was part of, and not distinguishable from, the parol agreement with the defendant to occupy for five years and pay one half the rent for that term. There does not seem to have been any evidence to require the conclusion that any other than such void agreement was made between the parties, or that the plaintiff became other than a mere tenant at will of the defendant. 1 Woodfall, Land. and T. 1st Am. ed. from 18th Eng. ed. 231.

The other cases cited by the defendant's counsel do not support the proposition asserted by him. There is no opportunity, upon the facts found, or upon any the finding of which the evidence requires, to hold that the defendant took and held the lease as trustee for the plaintiff as to a portion of the demised premises, or that a relation was assumed by the plaintiff to the lease between the lessor and the defendant which legally charged him with liability to the latter for moneys paid by him pursuant to it. The parol agreement between them was void and ineffectual for any such purpose.

The judgment should be affirmed.

All concur.

RIVER R. CO., Resp't.

2. If the performance of a railroad company's contract to transport a passenger is temporarily suspended by a defect in the road-bed, he is entitled, during the time required to overcome the defect, to all the rights of a passenger upon a moving train, including that of protection from the willful misconduct of the company's servants.
3. The porter of a sleeping or drawing-room car, which forms a part of the train of a railroad company under a contract with its owner, who sells separate tickets for privileges upon such cars and who furnishes his own servants to collect tickets and assist passengers, is the servant of the railroad company, for whose acts, done in the performance of a contract to carry a passenger, it is responsible, notwithstanding any agreement which may be made upon the subject between the company and the owner of the car.
4. The question as to whether or not a sleeping-car porter was in the performance of his duties as servant of a railroad company at the time he committed an assault upon a passenger, so as to make the company liable for his act, must be submitted to the jury, where the evidence shows that an accident rendered it necessary for the passenger to be transferred from the train upon which he took passage to another train; that the porter to whom he had surrendered his ticket and who was the only person who represented the company on the sleeping car assisted in making the transfer; that the passenger demanded a return of his ticket or an introduction to the persons in charge of the new train so that he might receive sleeping-car privileges thereon and that thereupon the porter committed the assault.

4. A carrier is liable for an unlawful and improper act and for the natural and legitimate consequences thereof, which is committed by its servant towards its passenger while such servant is engaged in performing a duty which the carrier owes to the passenger, no matter what the motive is which incites the commission of the act.

5. It is no defense to a suit against a carrier to recover damages for an assault committed by its servant upon a passenger that at the time the assault was committed the servant had finished the temporary and particular service which he had undertaken to render to the passenger, if the contract of carriage was not yet performed and the duty still rested on the carrier to protect the passenger from the violence of its servants.

APP^{EAL} by plaintiff from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of the New York Circuit dismissing the complaint in an action brought to recover damages for an assault committed on plaintiff by defendant's servant. Reversed.

Statement by Potter, J.:

The facts proven upon the trial were that plaintiff purchased tickets for himself and wife from Geneva to New York for a continuous passage in the ordinary car upon defendant's road, and also tickets for a section in a sleeping car in the same train from the porter, there being no other person acting as conductor thereof, and paid him for the same. In due run, he would have reached the City of New York the next morning, but upon awakening next morning he learned the train was detained at Utica owing to a washout near Amsterdam, and the plaintiff with the other passengers, after waiting until nearly noon, was informed by the porter of the sleeping car that he was required to take another train to the washout and there, after passing the washout, to take still another train to be carried to New York City.

The porter took the hand-baggage of plaintiff and his wife and conducted them to the train they were required to take from Utica to the washout.

NOTE.—Degree of care required of carriers of passengers. See note to Goodell v. Taylor (Minn.) 4 L. R. A. 673.

A master is liable for the tortious acts of his servant. See note to McCord v. Western U. Tel. Co. (Minn.) 1 L. R. A. 143.

The porter carrying their luggage or parcels, conducted them to the sleeping cars which formed a part of the train plaintiff was required to take, but not finding a vacant seat for the plaintiff and his wife in the sleeping car, conducted them into an ordinary coach forming a part of this train, and said to plaintiff very likely another sleeper would be put on to the train and then the plaintiff could have a seat in it. There were no vacant seats in this car, but a gentleman gave his seat to the plaintiff's wife, and the plaintiff remained standing. The porter deposited their luggage at the end of the car near the door.

The porter then turned to go away from plaintiff and walked towards the rear end of the car. Plaintiff then stepped after the porter, pulled his sleeve slightly, whereupon the porter turned towards the plaintiff, and the plaintiff said to the porter, "You have my sleeping-car ticket. I have nothing to show on the other side of the washout that I am entitled to sleeping-car accommodations. I wish you to give me something before you leave me; give me back my ticket so that I can have sleeping-car accommodations on the other side of the washout." The porter replied: "I keep that ticket to show to the Company." The plaintiff said to the porter: "If you cannot give me that, then take me to the ticket office here and tell them how things are and ask them to give me some check or ticket which I can show to the conductor on the other side of the washout."

The porter refused to go to the office with the plaintiff as requested, and then the plaintiff requested the porter to make the plaintiff acquainted with the sleeping-car conductor, who was going upon the train, and the porter replied that he would show the plaintiff the conductor. The plaintiff and the porter thereupon left the car, and walked along by the side of the train, and as they were passing along the porter pointed out a group of men wearing railroad uniforms, and said "There is the conductor." Plaintiff then said to the porter, "He does not know me; take me to him and make me acquainted with him, and tell him I am entitled to a section to New York." The porter turned to go away, saying: "That is none of my business." Plaintiff then said, touching the porter lightly on the arm: "You must not leave me without some satisfaction in this business." The porter thereupon said "Take your hand off me, or I'll hit you," and struck the plaintiff a violent blow in the face, knocking the plaintiff down, and rendering him unconscious.

These acts were done and declarations made in the yard of the defendant at Utica, which at the time contained the depot and station, trains, cars, offices and employes of the defendant, and numerous other passengers who had been detained at this point on account of the washout.

The plaintiff also introduced in evidence an agreement between the defendant and the New York Central Sleeping Car Company, the provisions of which bear upon the questions in this case will be referred to in the opinion, and rested.

The defendant moved for a dismissal of the complaint upon the grounds that the plaintiff had made out no cause of action against the defendant. That the cause of action stated in the complaint had not been made out. That the act complained of was not done within the scope of the authority of the person who did the act. That the act complained of was not done by any servant of the defendant within the scope of his or any authority he had. That the act complained of was not done by any servant of the defendant while engaged in performing any duty which the defendant owed to the plaintiff. That the act complained of was not an act to be foreseen or provided or guarded against by the defendant.

Mr. Hugh L. Cole, for appellant:

Plaintiff's assaillant was, for all purposes of this action, the servant of the defendant.

Thorp v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 70 N. Y. 402; Ulrich v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 10 Cent. Rep. 478, 108 N. Y. 80; Greenland, C. O. & I. R. Co. v. Wulfrath, 28 Ohio St. 481; Kinsley v. Lake Shore & M. H. R. Co. 125 Mass. 54; Pennsylvania Co. v. Ray, 108 U. S. 457 (26 L. ed. 144).

The assault having been committed during the course of the contract of carriage by one who had been intrusted with some participation in the execution thereof, the defendant is liable. It was not necessary to prove that the servant was acting within the scope of his authority.

Stewart v. Brooklyn & C. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 588; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Vandiver, 43 Pa. 385; Nieto v. Clark, 1 Cliff 145; Craker v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 36 Wis. 657; Torre House & I. R. Co. v. Jackson, 51 Ind. 21; Puapies v. Brunswick & A. R. Co. 60 Ga. 283; McKinley v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 44 Iowa, 314; Chicago & E. R. Co. v. Florman, 108 Ill. 546; Bryant v. Rich, 108 Mass. 190; Goddard v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 57 Me. 213; Sherley v. Billings, 3 Bush, 147.

Even if in fact at the time of the assault the porter was not engaged in performing any duty imposed upon him by the defendant, if third persons had a right to infer from the circumstances that he was so engaged, the defendant is liable.

1 Shearn. & Redf. Neg. § 143; Tuany v. Roberts, 31 Jones & S. 440; Bank of Batavia v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 7 Cent. Rep. 829, 108 N. Y. 201; Walsh v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 70 N. Y. 5; Isaacson v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 94 N. Y. 286.

The question whether the porter was so engaged, or whether the plaintiff had a right to infer that he was so engaged, at the time he committed the assault, should have been submitted to the jury.

Hart v. Hudson River Bridge Co. 30 N. Y. 929; Jackson v. Second Ave. R. Co. 47 N. Y. 274.

The case is precisely the same as if the blow had been struck on the train.

Mr. Frank Loomis, for respondent:

Defendant undertook to protect the plaintiff against any injury arising from the negligence or willful misconduct of its servants only while they were engaged in performing a duty which the defendant owed to the plaintiff.

Stewart v. Brooklyn & C. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 588.

Potter, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

The defendant was under contract obligations to transport the plaintiff with his wife from Geneva to the City of New York, and it had entered upon the performance of the contract, when further performance was temporarily suspended until the defendant could make arrangements to overcome the difficulty and obstruction caused by the washout of its road bed.

While this was being done the plaintiff was a passenger of the defendant and entitled to all the rights which pertain to a passenger upon a train moving towards the point or destination specified in the contract of carriage. Among the obligations which such a contract imposes upon the carrier are "to protect the passenger against any injury from negligence or willful misconduct of its servants while performing the contract and of his fellow passengers and strangers, so far as practicable, to treat him respectfully and to provide him with the usual accommodations and any information and facilities necessary for the full performance of the contract upon the part of the carrier. And these obligations continue to rest upon the carrier, its servants and employes while such contract continues and is in process of performance." Thorpe v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 76 N. Y. 402; Stewart v. Brooklyn & Q. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 598; Pursons v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 113 N. Y. 355, 3 L. R. A. 698; Thompson, Car. 50; Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Kruer, 80 Ohio St. 222.

There cannot be any serious question that such are the ordinary duties and obligations between the passenger and the carrier.

The relation of the plaintiff and defendant being that of passenger and carrier, with the duties and obligations to each other resulting from such relation, these questions arise and require consideration in the determination of this case: Was the sleeping-car porter the agent of the defendant? And if so, was he engaged in the performance of his duties as such agent at the time of inflicting the blow upon the plaintiff?

The answer to the first question is that the porter of a sleeping or drawing room car, even in cases where there is a contract, like the contract put in evidence by the plaintiff in this case, between the railroad company, which sells a passage ticket in its ordinary coaches to a passenger, and the proprietors of a sleeping car, who sell a ticket to the same passenger for a seat and berth in a sleeping car running in the same train, is the servant of the railroad company. This question has been definitely settled by the highest court in this State and of the United States. Thorpe v. New York Cent. & H. R. Co. 76 N. Y. 406; Pennsylvania Co. v. Roy, 100 U. S. 451 [20 L. ed. 141].

The contracts in those two cases are in all essential respects like the contract in this case. The railroad company, in those cases as in this case, did not own the drawing-room or sleeping car. Nor did it hire or pay the porter. The contract required that the servants employed by the sleeping car company should be acceptable to the Railroad Company, with other stipulations of a correlative character not necessary to be specified.

In those cases it was held that the law will not permit a railroad company engaged in the business of carrying persons for hire, through any device or arrangement with a sleeping-car company, whose cars are used by the railroad and constitute a part of its train, to evade the duty that is imposed upon it by law, and that the defense that the porter was not the servant of the railroad company, but of the sleeping or drawing room car company, is not a defense to the railroad company, or rather, in the language of Judge Andrews, "that the persons in charge of the drawing-room car are to be regarded and treated in respect to their dealings with passengers as the servants of the defendant (the railroad company) and that the defendant is responsible for their acts to the same extent as if they were directly employed by the company."

And this court in the same case, Thorpe v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., supra, holds that the Act of 1839, chap. 126, introduced by the plaintiff in the case under consideration, authorizing railroad and sleeping and drawing-room car companies to make contracts of that character, carefully provided that it should not be construed to exonerate the railroad company from the payment of damages for injuries in the same way and to the same extent as if the cars were owned and provided by the railroad company.

These cases hold, as matter of law, that the porter of the sleeping car is, in the performance of the duties and obligations of the railroad company under its contract to carry a passenger, the servant of the railroad.

The second of the above questions is, Was the sleeping-car porter engaged in the performance of his duties as such agent at the time of inflicting the blow upon the plaintiff? That question must in this and similar cases depend upon the evidence, and must be determined by the jury. The office of the court is to determine what facts are proper to be submitted to the jury for its determination of that question.

We think the evidence in this case should have been submitted to the jury. The evidence was to this effect: that the defendant had contracted to carry the plaintiff to New York; that contract had not been performed but was in process of performance; that the porter was actually engaged in the performance of services to that end; that owing to the interruption of the train upon which the defendant was carrying the plaintiff to his destination, it became necessary to transfer the plaintiff to another train; that the porter so informed plaintiff and was transferring the plaintiff to the other train with his luggage; that the porter was the person of whom the plaintiff purchased and paid for his seat and berth and to whom the plaintiff had surrendered it upon demand, and was in short the only person with whom the plaintiff had any business relations upon the train, and was the only person who represented the defendant or whom the defendant had in any manner put forward or presented in the sleeping car to perform the duty and service which the defendant owed the plaintiff. Upon these and other facts developed upon the trial, the question should have been submitted to the jury whether or not the porter was not at this time and down to the act of striking the plaintiff the servant of the defendant. Buffett v. Troy & R. R. Co. 40 N. Y. 109; Toney v. Roberts, 31 Jones & S. 445-447; Alt-hoff v. Wolfe, 29 N. Y. 355; Jennison v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 94 N. Y. 979.

But it is urged that if the porter was as matter of law, or if the jury had found upon such submission as matter of fact that the porter was, the servant of the defendant at the time and place of striking the plaintiff, the striking was willful and malicious upon the part of the porter and beyond the scope of his employment; and further, that the porter had finished the service he was performing for defendant towards the plaintiff and that the defendant owed the plaintiff no further duty.

I need not stop to discuss the contention that the master is not liable for the willful and malicious acts of a servant of a carrier towards or upon a passenger. The case of Stewart v. Brooklyn & C. R. Co., 90 N. Y. 589, settles that question against the defendant in this case. In that Judge Tracy says: "By the defendant's contract with the plaintiff it had undertaken to carry him safely, and to treat him respectfully, and while a common carrier does not undertake to insure against any injury from every possible danger, he does undertake to protect the passengers against any injury from the negligence or willful misconduct of its servants while engaged in performing a duty which the carrier owes to the passenger. A common carrier is bound so far as practicable to protect his passengers, while being conveyed, from violence committed by strangers and co-passengers, and he undertakes absolutely to protect them against the misconduct of its own servants engaged in executing the contract," or, as otherwise therein expressed, "from an assault committed upon a passenger by a servant intrusted with the execution of a contract of a common carrier." Ward v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 17 N. Y. 362.

These and numerous other cases hold that no matter what the motive is which induces the servant of the carrier to commit an unlawful or improper act towards the passenger during the existence of the relation of carrier and passenger, the carrier is liable for the act and its natural and legitimate consequences. Nieto v. Clark, 1 Cliff. 145; Com. v. Power, 7 Met. 606; Goddard v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 57 Me. 209, 9 Am. Rep. 30; Orester v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 36 Wis. 657, 17 Am. Rep. 504; Chicago & R. R. Co. v. Ferman, 108 Ill. 546.

It is also urged in behalf of defendant in this case, that the porter had performed all the duties which, as the servant of the defendant, he owed to the plaintiff. I think this view of the situation and obligations of the parties in this case is entirely too narrow and is untenable.

The contract of carriage between the plaintiff and defendant was but partially performed, and was in the actual process of performance. The plaintiff had been waiting through the forenoon to enable the defendant to make the necessary arrangements to complete its contract of carriage. The arrangement made by the defendant for that purpose was to start an independent train from Utica. This required the transfer of the plaintiff and his luggage to such train. It was necessary that the plaintiff should be informed of this, and that he with his luggage should be transferred to such other train. The porter was attending to this duty, and to that end had placed the plaintiff in an ordinary car to resume his journey. If the plaintiff had been injured by any negligence or misconduct of the defendant's servant, or from a defect in the defendant's railroad grounds or walks or yard while waiting the making up and taking of the extra train, there could be no question as to the liability of the defendant therefor. Gusman v. Long Island R. Co. 9 Hun, 613, affirmed in 75 N. Y. 600; Parsons v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 115 N. Y. 355, 3 L. R. A. 662.

The passenger is entitled to all necessary information to enable him to pursue his journey with safety and despatch, and he has often been held guilty of contributory negligence, relieving the carrier from liability, for his omission to make such inquiries. Siner v. Great Western R. Co. L. R. 3 Exch. 160, cited in note to the opinion, Hulbert v. New York Cent. R. Co. 40 N. Y. 154.

If it is the duty of the passenger to make inquiry, it is the corresponding duty of the carrier to give the information sought. The porter had undertaken to furnish such information to the plaintiff, or to introduce him to the conductor of the sleeping car for that purpose, and while so engaged had refused to complete the work, and struck plaintiff the blow complained of.

As we have seen, the defendant owed the plaintiff the duty to transport him to New York, and during its performance to care for his comfort and safety. This duty of protecting the personal safety of the passenger, and promoting by every reasonable means the accomplishment of his journey, is continuous, and embraces other attentions and services than the occasional services required in giving the passenger a seat or some temporary accommodation. Hence whatever is done by the carrier or its servants which interferes with or injures the health or strength or person of the traveler, or prevents the accomplishment of his journey in the most reasonable and speedy manner, is a violation of the carrier's contract, and he must be held responsible for it.

The idea that the servant of a carrier of persons may, in the intervals between rendering personal services to the passenger for his accommodation, assault the person of the passenger, destroy his consciousness and disable him from further pursuit of his journey, is not consistent with the duty that the carrier owes to the passenger, and is little less than monstrous.

While this general duty rested upon the defendant to protect the person of the passenger during the entire performance of the contract, it signifies but little or nothing whether the servant had or had not completed the temporary or particular service he was performing, or had completed the performance of it, when the blow was struck. That blow was given by a servant of the defendant, while the defendant was performing its contract to carry safely and to protect the person of the plaintiff, and was a violation of such contract.

Hence, we think the court should not have dismissed the complaint, but should have submitted these facts and the circumstances attending the blow to the jury, upon the question whether or not the porter was in the performance of his duties as the defendant's agent when the blow was inflicted.

The judgment should be reversed and a new trial granted, with costs to abide the event.

All concur.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Indiana, vs. John WORRELL, Appel.

William A. PEELLE, Jr.

(....Ind....)

1. An incumbent of an office, whose demurrer to a complaint disputing his title thereto has been sustained by the trial court, is not debarred from setting up by way of answer a different claim of title to the office than the one already considered, in case of the reversal and remanding of the cause by the supreme court, if he in good faith believes he has a different title and has not yet addressed an answer to the complaint.

2. No valid appointment can be made to an office in possession of an incumbent whose term has not yet expired; and the surrender of the office by the prior incumbent to the appointee will confer upon him no title thereto.

3. There can be no valid appointment to an office so long as the appointing power is not called into exercise.

4. Records of the official acts of the governor, which are kept in a public office, are competent evidence upon the question of the title of a person to an office which he claims under the governor's commission.

5. A commission given by the governor, who has power to appoint incumbents to a certain office, authorizing a person to serve in such office, which expressly recites that such person derives his claim of title from an election by the Legislature and is commissioned for that reason, does not give the person a valid title to the office as the governor's appointee.

APPEAL by relator from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Marion County in favor of defendant in a proceeding by information to obtain possession of a certain office in possession of defendant, who was alleged to have no title thereto. Reversed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinions.

NOTE.—Appointment to office.

The power to appoint to office is not a legislative, but an executive, function. State v. Hyde, 121 Ind. 20.

Appointments to office, by whomsoever made, are intrinsically executive acts. State v. Barbour, 3 New Eng. Rep. 606, 68 Conn. 76.

An appointment is complete when the last act required of the appointing power has been performed. Ibid.

The provision of Ind. Const., art. 15, § 1, that all officers whose appointments are not otherwise provided for in the Constitution "shall be chosen in such manner as now is or hereafter may be prescribed by law," while giving the Legislature power to make laws regulating appointments, does not give it power itself to choose the officers. State v. Peelle, 121 Ind. 406; State v. Hyde, supra.

The Legislature cannot delegate the power to one state officer to appoint another state officer. State v. Hyde, supra.

The term "vacancy" applies to an existing office without an incumbent, although it has never been filled. Re Election of District Judges, 11 Colo. 372.

By the appointment of a successor, the appointing power recognizes the fact that a vacancy has occurred. McGee v. State, 1 West. Rep. 466, 109 Ind. 444.

If a vacancy in the office of county treasurer is left by the change of the time of beginning the term, the power to fill it is in the board of county commissioners, under Colo. Const., art. 14, § 2. Re House Bill No. 26 (Colo.) Dec. Term, 1882.

The governor of Indiana, in case of vacancy in a state office, can make an appointment until the next general election, when the people may elect an incumbent to the office. State v. Hyde, supra.

Under Colo. Const., art. 4, § 6, providing that the governor shall appoint, with the consent of the Senate, "all officers whose appointment or election is not otherwise provided for, the consent of the Senate is not required where the appointment of officers is expressly conferred by statute upon the governor alone. Re Question Propounded by the Governor (Colo.) March 29, 1890.

The governor's commission is merely prima facie evidence of the facts recited therein. State v. Chapin, 9 West. Rep. 65, 110 Ind. 272.

An officer appointed by the governor to fill a vacancy will hold, not for the remainder of the term, but only until the qualification of a successor chosen at the next ensuing general election, to be held in accordance with Fla. Const., art. 15, § 2. Vacancies in Elective County Offices (Fla.) Jan. 14, 1890.

An illegal appointment to fill an assumed vacancy confers no protection on the appointee, when coupled with a prior removal in the exercise of quasi-judicial discretion. Nichols v. MacLean, 3 Cent. Rep. 200, 101 N. Y. 535.

The legality of an officer's appointment cannot be collaterally attacked. State v. Brooks, 39 La. Ann. 217.

Officer de facto.

If the successor in office is not appointed in conformity with the law, the incumbent will continue in office, not as a mere de facto officer, but as officer de jure. Smoot v. Somerville, 59 Md. 88.

One cannot be a de facto officer unless he is acting as such under color of having been rightfully elected or appointed. East Norway Lake N. B. L. Church v. Halvorson (Minn.) Feb. 10, 1890.

Since there can be no such thing as an officer de facto when there is no office to fill, a person, although acting in good faith, cannot be an officer de facto where the vacancy caused by the expiration of his term has been filled by the election of another. State v. Lane (R. I.) Oct. 14, 1892.

Trial of title to office.

The proper proceeding to try a title to an office is by quo warranto, not certiorari; but it only lies Neers, Louis T. Michener, Atty-Gen., Albert J. Beveridge, John H. Gillette, Frank H. Blackledge and Leander M. Campbell, for appellant:

A commission does not constitute the official title, but is merely a certificate of such title. Where it certifies that the person commissioned derived his title from some other source than appointment, it is absolutely conclusive evidence that such person was not appointed.

The circumstances under which it was issued may be shown in order to explain, establish or overthrow the title to which such commission does certify.

Thompson v. State, 21 Ala. 55; State v. Ashew, 48 Ark. 86; State v. Chapin, 9 West. Rep. 58, 110 Ind. 276.

Mr. Addison C. Harris, also for appellant:

One man cannot hold the same office at the same time under two adverse claims or titles or sources of power or authority. The rights or titles are not concurrent, and, the choice between them being once made, the right to follow the other is forever gone.

Rodermund v. Clark, 46 N. Y. 357.

The case is analogous to those in which the right to occupy incompatible offices was denied, in which it has been ruled:

against one who has been in actual possession and user. State v. Camden Co. 1 Cent. Rep. 438, 47 N. J. L. 454; People v. Riordan (Mich.) Feb. 1, 1889.

In Michigan quo warranto is the only way to try title to office finally and conclusively. Fray v. Michie, 13 West. Rep. 467, 68 Mich. 232.

In Texas, however, it is not the only method to be pursued for the recovery of an office. The right to an office may be determined in an ordinary civil suit brought directly by the claimant against the party in possession. McAllen v. Rhodes, 45 Tex. 564.

Quo warranto will not lie when an office is vacant. Nichols v. MacLean, 2 Cent. Rep. 300, 191 N. Y. 523; State v. McCullough (Neb.) July 8, 1888; Williams v. Clayton (Utah) March 8, 1888.

Conceding that the right to an office may be conferred by mandamus, the writ will not issue unless the person, if any, in possession of the office, is made a party to the proceeding. Kelly v. Edwards, 69 Cal. 460.

Neers, McCullough & Harlan and Stanton J. Peelle for appellee.

Berkshire, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is the second time this case has been in this court. State, ex rel. Worrell, v. Peelle, 121 Ind. 493.

When the case was first before the circuit court judgment was rendered for the appellee upon a demurrer to the complaint. From the judgment so rendered an appeal was prosecuted to this court. In this court the judgment was reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer to the complaint. When the cause again came before the circuit court the appellee answered in two paragraphs. The first paragraph may be contested by any elector of the district or county. Rev. Stat. § 3009; Dalton v. State, 1 West. Rep. 734, 48 Ohio St. 652.

A predecessor in office cannot contest the validity of his successor's appointment by refusing to deliver up the records of the office. McGee v. State, 1 West. Rep. 467, 108 Ind. 444.

Giving a full and fair hearing to an officer is insufficient to give validity to proceedings against him for his removal, where the proceedings before the hearing have not been in accordance with the statute. People v. Therrien (Mich.) April 11, 1890.

In a proceeding to contest the right to an office, where the single material issue is whether relator received a majority of the votes, further issues as to whether the returns from certain townships were properly rejected by the board of canvassers are immaterial; and findings of the jury on these, which are inconsistent with their findings on the real issue, may be disregarded. Gatling v. Boone, 101 N. C. 61.

Where the question is whether there was a vacancy to be filled by an election or appointment, or where it is, Did the law authorize the election or appointment in a given case?—courts have jurisdiction to determine the law of the case. Robertson v. State, 7 West. Rep. 494, 109 Ind. 98.

Cal. Penal Code, § 770, providing that from a judgment of removal from office an appeal may be taken in the same manner as from a judgment in a civil action, but until reversal defendant is suspended from office, and that pending the appeal the office must be filled as in case of a vacancy,—is applicable to proceedings under § 772, providing for removal of public officers by summary proceedings. Woods v. Varnum (Cal.) Jan. 30, 1890.

was a special denial and the second paragraph the general denial.

It would have been proper practice had the appellant filed a motion to strike out the first paragraph as an incumbrance to the second, notwithstanding there would have been no available error had such a motion been filed and overruled.

Several paragraphs of reply were filed to the first paragraph of answer, but regarding it as a mere denial of the allegations in the complaint, the reply becomes wholly without importance.

The cause, being at issue, was submitted to the court for trial and a finding made there after for the appellee. The appellant moved the court for a new trial, which motion the court overruled and the proper exception was reserved. Judgment was then rendered for the appellee, and from that judgment this appeal is prosecuted. When the case was here the first time the whole contention was as to the power of the Legislature, under the Constitution, to designate the incumbent to the office in question. The appellee rested his claim to the office upon an election by the Legislature, and the appellant's relator relied upon an appointment from the executive of the State. The appellee now claims title to the office by virtue of an appointment from the executive of the State, while the appellant's relator assumes the same position as heretofore.

After the cause had been remanded to the court below, as the appellee had not yet addressed an answer to the complaint, he was not debarred from setting up, by way of answer, a different claim of title than the one already considered by this and the court below, if he in good faith believed he had any different title. And the question now is, Does the appellee hold the office in question by appointment from the executive department of the government? As we understand the position of the appellee, it is that he holds the office (1) by appointment from Gov. Porter, and (2) by appointment from Gov. Gray. For two sufficient reasons the appellee received no appointment to the office in question from Governor Porter, the second of which applies with equal force to the action of Gov. Gray.

First. At the time the appellee claims to have received his appointment from Gov. Porter, John B. Conner, Esq., was rightfully holding the office and his term of office did not expire for one and one half months thereafter. That the governor could make no valid appointment under such circumstances, it is only necessary to cite the well-considered case of State v. Harrison, 113 Ind. 434, 18 West. Rep. 870.

But the contention is urged that, even if the appointment was void when made, as Conner thereafter surrendered the office to the appellee, his appointment was thereby validated. This position cannot be maintained. The appointment being void at its inception, no act of the governor could thereafter give it validity. It will hardly be expected that we take the time to cite authorities to support so plain a proposition. And it is sufficient to say that if the governor could not validate his own void act, Conner could not do so for him. The surrender of the office by Conner to the appellee we think amounted to an abandonment thereof and created a vacancy therein; but if there were any doubt as to this proposition, both parties have so treated it, and for all the purposes of this case we would be bound to so hold.

After the vacancy had been created, the governor was authorized to fill it by appointment and could have appointed the appellee, and if this had been done the appellee would have held the office by virtue of the appointment then made, and not because of the commission issued to the appellee before Conner abandoned the office.

Upon the question that the surrender of an office by its rightful incumbent to one claiming title thereto without right does not give to the latter title thereto, we refer to Turnipseed v. Hudson, 60 Minn. 429, 19 Am. Rep. 16.

The second reason why the appellee did not receive an appointment from the executive is that the appointing power lodged with him under the Constitution was never invoked in behalf of the appellee, and so long as it was not called into exercise there could be no appointment, although the governor could at any time call it into action.

It appears that the General Assembly assumed (and it was but an assumption) to take from the executive department the power therein vested under the Constitution to designate the incumbent of the office in question, and not only so, but to legislate the rightful incumbent of said office out of office before the expiration of his term, and to take unto themselves the election of an incumbent to said office, and as the result the General Assembly elected the appellee and gave him a certificate of election. The first election occurred on the 3d day of March, 1883, and upon a certificate thereof being presented to the executive he issued the following commission:

"The State of Indiana, To all who shall see these presents, greeting:

"Whereas, It has been certified by the proper authority that, at a joint convention of the two Houses of the Fifty-third General Assembly, held in the hall of the House of Representatives, March 3d, 1883, that William A. Peelle, Jr., was elected Chief of the Bureau of Statistics,

"Therefore, know ye, that in the name and by the authority of the State aforesaid, I do hereby appoint and commission William A. Peelle, Jr., Chief of the Bureau of Statistics aforesaid, to serve as such for the term of two years from the 8th day of March, 1883, and until his successor shall have been elected and qualified.

In witness whereof, etc.

By the Governor, Albert G. Porter.
W. R. Myers, Secretary of State.

There was no pretense that the appellee held any other title to the office than that which the said election conferred upon him, and when we remember the aggressive attitude of the General Assembly at this time with reference to its power to elect the incumbents to a large class of offices, including the one in question (and of this we take judicial knowledge), the appellee would not have been willing to have recognized the executive department as the source of his title.

The governor was careful to rectify in the commission the nature of the appellee's title, and that he commissioned him as the chosen of the General Assembly.

That it was the purpose and intention of the governor when he issued the commission to deliver to the appellee the evidence of his title as derived from the Legislature, and to make it distinctly appear that he was in no sense the appointee of the executive, is so manifest that there is no ground for a contrary contention to rest upon.

But, in addition to what appears on the face of the commission, the records of the executive office disclose the fact that the commission was issued to the appellee because and on account of his election by the General Assembly. We know of no sufficient reason why these records are not competent evidence. They are the records kept in a public office of the official acts of the chief executive officer of the State. But see Marbury v. Madison, 5 U. S. 1 Cranch, 137 [2 L. ed. 60].

But it still further appears that after the appellee received his commission from Gov. Porter, he recognized the Legislature, and not the executive, as the source from which he derived title to the office. The following is the oath which was administered to him and indorsed on his commission:

State of Indiana, }
Marion County, } ss.

I, William A. Peelle, Jr., do solemnly swear that I will support the Constitution of the United States and of the State of Indiana, and that I will honestly and faithfully discharge my duties as chief of the Bureau of Statistics, for the term for which I have been elected, to the best of my ability, so help me God.

William A. Peelle, Jr.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 9th day of March, 1883.

S. P. Sheerin, Clerk Supreme Court.

But it is contended that by some kind of legal fiction the appellee, each time he was commissioned by the governor, became his appointee. This contention is not very clearly defined, but proceeds, as we understand it (in part at least) upon the theory that all persons are presumed to know the law and that this presumption applies as well to public officers as to individuals; and as Governors Porter and Gray are presumed to have known when they commissioned the appellee that the General Assembly had no power to elect him to the office, the presumption must prevail that they intended by their official acts in commissioning him to appoint him to the office, and that this presumption must prevail over their expressed intention to the contrary; or, to express the contention in other language, though they intended by their official acts to do one thing and in fact did what they intended, that in law they did something else. This is carrying the doctrine of presumptions beyond precedent and we think beyond reason. For some purposes the presumption contended for prevails, but it is never applied to a question such as the one here under consideration. It is usually recognized in the construction of contracts and the enforcement of penal statutes, but we know of no case where it has been allowed to give to the official act of a public officer a different legal effect than the act itself expressly declares was intended. See Citizen's Loan Assn. v. Friedley (Ind.), 7 L. R. A. 689.

On the 9th day of February, 1885, the Legislature again elected the appellee to the office in question, and thereafter, upon a certificate of election, the governor issued to him a commission. In 1887 there was no election and the appellee continued to hold the office until 1889, when the Legislature again elected him to the office, and on presentation of his certificate of election to the governor a commission was refused, and, the governor having appointed the appellant's relator and commissioned him, this controversy arose.

The following is the appellee's commission from Governor Gray:

The State of Indiana, To all who shall see these presents, greeting:

Whereas, it has been certified to me by the proper authority that William A. Peelle, Jr., has been elected to the office of chief of the Bureau of Statistics of the State of Indiana, by the General Assembly on the 9th day of February, A. D. 1885.

Therefore, Know Ye, that in the name and by the authority of the State aforesaid, I do hereby commission the said William A. Peelle, Jr. as said chief of the Bureau of Statistics of the State of Indiana for the term of two years from the 8th day of March, 1885, and until his successor shall have been elected and qualified.

In witness whereof, etc.

By the Governor, Isaac P. Gray.
William B. Myers, Secretary of State.

We have nothing to add with reference to Governor Gray's action, except to say that he seemed to be more careful, if possible, than his predecessor to emphasize the fact that the appellee was not his appointee, but was commissioned as the chosen of the General Assembly. The word "appoint" is found in the commission issued by Gov. Porter, but nowhere appears in that of Gov. Gray.

But the further contention of the appellee is that, as the appointing power was lodged with the executive of the State, his purpose or intention in commissioning the appellee cannot be inquired into; that notwithstanding the purpose is disclosed in the face of the commission all of its recitals must be disregarded, and the commission treated as an appointment made by the executive. Much that we have already said is here applicable. This is but contending for a conclusive presumption that you must take an officer to mean one thing when he does another.

As the appointing power was lodged in the executive when he commissioned the appellee, had the commission recited an appointment or had it been silent as to the source of the appellee's title to the office, then no doubt the commission would have been conclusive for the very good reason that the mental operations of the governor's mind unexpressed in the act could not be inquired into; and if for no other reason, such inquiry would be impracticable. But when the source of title is lodged somewhere else than with the executive his commission is only prima facie evidence of title. Reens Co. v. State, 61 Ind. 379; Reynolds v. State, 61 Ind. 383; Hench v. State, 73 Ind. 297;

State v. Chapin, 110 Ind. 873, 9 West. Rep. 83; Marbury v. Madison, supra.

This court has gone so far as to hold that even after the governor has issued a commission, if it appears that he has commissioned a wrongful claimant, to the prejudice of one who is rightfully entitled to the office, he may issue the second commission. Gulick v. Hess, 14 Ind. 98.

The same reasons which make the governor's commission conclusive when silent as to the source of title, that the person commissioned is the governor's appointee, where he has the power to appoint an incumbent to such office, render his commission conclusive that such person is not his appointee when it recites that the person commissioned derives his claim of title because of an election by the people or Legislature, and is commissioned because thereof.

We hold that when the appellant's relator was appointed there was a vacancy in the office which the governor was empowered to fill by appointment until there should be an election by the people.

Judgment reversed, with costs.

Elliott, J., dissenting:

I am so strongly convinced that the law is with the appellee that I cannot assent to the prevailing opinion. The importance of the questions involved requires a statement of my reasons for dissenting, and this statement I shall make without elaboration.

Governor Porter issued to Peelle a commission in March, 1883, and under that commission he entered into possession of the office. At the expiration of the term designated in the commission issued by Governor Porter, Governor Gray, then the governor of the State, issued a commission to Peelle, and under these commissions he continued in undisturbed possession of the office, discharging its duties and recognized as an officer de jure by all the departments of the government until this action was brought. He entered into office under Governor Porter's commission and continued under that of Governor Gray. He entered office, therefore, by executive sanction, and his continuance in office was by executive authority, for either this must be true, or else it must be true that no executive power or function was exercised in commissioning him; and, surely, in every commission there is some expression of executive judgment.

The law of the case as declared on the former appeal, which controls us now whatever may be our individual opinions, is that the legislative election in 1883 was utterly void, and if it was void Peelle could not have entered into the office nor have held it under that election, for it is absolutely inconceivable that a void act can confer right or title. But Peelle did go into office and has continued there for nearly seven years, and the only power which could put or keep him there was and is that of the chief executive of the State; and the chief executive, by the commissions issued to him, authorized him to enter into the office and to continue in it, so far as it was in the power of the chief executive to do so. The chief executive alone had power to put and keep him in office, and it was the chief executive that did put him into office and continued him there by designating him as the person entitled to the office in the commission issued to him. It seems clear to me that the only power to which Peelle's appointment is referable is the executive power, for there is no other to which it can by any possibility be referred.

The fact that Governors Porter and Gray recited in the commissions issued by them that Peelle was elected by the General Assembly, and that he was commissioned because he was so elected, does not prove that the minds of the chief executives did not assent to and confirm his appointment. They knew the law; they knew that they alone possessed the appointing power, and, knowing this, they designated him as the person to fill the office, and thus gave him the place by their own acts, for it was in their power, and in theirs alone, to withhold the office or to bestow it upon him. No other department of the government could either bestow or withhold the office. The law as declared on the former appeal is not a new law, for, according to the decision, it has existed since the adoption of the Constitution, and it was known to the governors of the State at the time the commissions were issued, for no man can be deemed ignorant of the law, certainly not the highest officers in the State.

Neither Governor Porter nor Governor Gray was the mere agent or clerk of the General Assembly, for in appointing to office the governor exercises a power vested in him by the Constitution. He is beyond legislative control in all cases where he exercises his constitutional prerogative, and that was verised in this instance.

What may be the power of the governor under a valid statute is a question with which we have here not the remotest concern. Here the commissions were issued because the chief executive had the constitutional power to issue them by virtue of his prerogative. He could not, indeed, issue them by virtue of any other right or power vested in him.

In exercising his constitutional prerogative the governor exercises his own will and judgment. No one can share the power with him nor divide the responsibility. As the issuing of the commissions were executive acts under the Constitution, they express the executive judgment and will, for they can express no other in a case such as this where the governor possesses the whole and the exclusive appointing power.

If either Governor Porter or Governor Gray exercised the constitutional prerogative of the chief executive,—and in this instance no other could have been exercised,—then, what moved them to do it, or what reason, belief, motive or opinion influenced them, is not a question for judicial cognizance, nor can it be under our Constitution. To attempt to ascertain in any mode or under any circumstances, or by any process or procedure, what influence controlled the mind and judgment of the governor, would be an invasion of the executive domain which no authority will warrant nor any principle justify. If the courts can, by one mode, whether by examining the commission or by some other, inquire what belief, motive or opinion influenced the judgment of the governor, they can do so in any mode, and this would subject the exercise of executive power to judicial control. Our Constitution expressly forbids that this ever be done. It cannot be said that there is one mode in which the inquiry may be prosecuted and no other, for once it is granted that the question is a judicial one, then all modes are open to the courts and they may probe the executive mind in every method known to the law. I affirm that the courts cannot prosecute any inquiry for the purpose of ascertaining what influenced the governor to issue a commission in such a case as this, for it is a question over which the courts have no jurisdiction.

In a case where the power to appoint resides exclusively in the governor, and where he writes the name of a person in a commission and delivers it to him, he exercises his constitutional prerogative, for he can exercise no other. When it is ascertained that the governor has issued a commission there the power of the court terminates.

No ingenuity of invention nor any subtlety of argument can make it appear otherwise than that in the judgment of Governor Gray and of Governor Porter, Peella was the man entitled to the office. This was the executive judgment, and the executive judgment is conclusive, for the sole and absolute power of appointing to an office which it is the prerogative of the governor to fill by appointment is in the governor. His judgment, however influenced, no court can supervise. Even if it be true that the executive judgment was misled or was controlled by an erroneous view, still it was the executive judgment, and as such beyond review. The executive judgment was called into exercise and the executive pen wrote the name of the man designated to fill the office. If there was an exercise of executive judgment, no matter how involved or upon what grounds it proceeds, it is unimpeachable, for there is no tribunal that has jurisdiction to investigate the question of executive conduct in cases where, as in this, the power of deciding resides wholly in the governor.

It is useless to cite as authority or as illustrations cases where the appointing power is not exclusively vested in the governor, for they have not the remotest application in such a case as this. Such cases prove nothing at all to the point, nor prove anything that anybody desires, for all concede that where the governor has not the exclusive appointing power, his commission is not the vehicle for conveying the title to the office. But even in such cases it does convey some expression of the executive judgment.

It must be true that a commission issued by the governor in a case such as this, where he has the whole appointing power, expresses his judgment, or it must be true that it is utterly void. To declare it void is to affirm that the highest officer of the State did a vain and idle thing, and this no court has power to do. Nor can it be assumed that the governor, having the sole power to appoint, has violated his constitutional duty and his oath, and laid down his high constitutional prerogative at the feet of the Legislature. If it be adjudged that he yielded to an unconstitutional statute, surrendered his executive independence and invested a man with the indicia of office, it is necessary ly asserted that he wrongfully yielded his executive independence and violated his duty; and this assertion no court can rightfully make, for the plain reason that it can do no more than ascertain that the governor has invested the man he names in his commission with the legal indicia of title. The act of issuing a commission, of itself and by its own force and vigor, expresses the executive judgment that the man named shall take the office, and no court can inquire what belief or opinion influenced the judgment of the chief executive.

The act of issuing a commission, where the governor has the sole power of appointment, is absolutely, wholly and exclusively executive. It is impossible that it can be partly executive and partly legislative. It embodies the judgment of the governor; this it embodies and this alone, for it cannot embody the judgment of anyone else on earth. If it embodies any part of the executive judgment no court can inquire what influenced that judgment without usurping power that belongs to another department of the government.

It is not within the power of the courts to examine any evidence, whether supplied by the commission, by the books of the governor's office or by the oral statements of the governor, for the purpose of ascertaining whether he was influenced by an insufficient or an illegal cause to clothe the man whose name he wrote on the commission with the indicia of office.

President Garfield wrote upon the commission of General Wallace "Ben Hur," and surely no one would assert that it was competent for the courts to inquire whether the presidential judgment was influenced by that great book. If, however, they can inquire into the motives or opinions of the appointing power in any case, they can do so in such a case as that instanced as an illustration as well as in any other. The only defensible conclusion is, that, if the instrument is a commission, what is written in it has no force as evidence, beyond the fact that the person named is designated as the one who in the executive judgment is entitled to the office specified, and the courts have no power to push their investigation beyond that point. I repeat that we are here dealing with a case where the sole right to appoint resides in the governor, for the rule is different where the governor has not the appointing power. Back of him in such a case is the source of right and title, but where he has the exclusive power he is the exclusive creator of title and right. He is the sole fountain of right and power. No more need be known, and no more can legally be known, by the courts than that he has designated a person to fill an office by writing his name in a commission and delivering it to him.

But if it be conceded, a concession that is wholly unauthorized, that the courts may search the commission to discover what belief, motive or opinion controlled the mind of the chief executive and induced him to issue and deliver to the person designated the indicia of office, the utmost that can be said is that Governor Porter and Governor Gray were influenced by the legislative election to decide in his favor. Grant that this does appear and so appear that the courts can regard it as evidence, and still it does not authorize the inference that the designation or appointment was not that of the governor. All that can be inferred, according to the recital the utmost possible force as evidence, is that the legislative election influenced the two governors from whom Peelle holds commissions to designate him for the office, for, upon no principle of law or logic can it be assumed that those high officers yielded their official prerogatives to a void and dead legislative declaration. Those officers were bound by the strongest and highest considerations that can influence men to exercise their judgment and to maintain the executive independence, and it must be assumed that they did their sworn duty and did exercise their judgment. Either this must be true or it must be true that two of the highest officers of the State weakly yielded to legislative usurpation and inexcusably surrendered their executive independence.

But more than this. If it be adjudged that the commissions were issued by the governor, because the Legislature bade them do it, then it is affirmed that two of the governors of the State were ignorant of a principle of constitutional law, and yielded, not to an actual command, but to a legislative declaration having not one spark of vitality. If it be conceded that the courts may search for evidence to prove what opinion, belief or motive operated upon the mind of the governor, it is much more reasonable to assume that the executive judgment simply coincided in the legislative selection or designation and united with the Legislature in designating the person who should fill the office, than it is to assume that the governor yielded to an invalid statute and acted simply as the passive agent of the Legislature. The assumption suggested as the reasonable one leads to no unjust or evil consequences, attributes no ignorance to either of the governors, nor imputes to him any violation of duty, whereas, the assumption that the recitals in the commission show that he issued the commission solely because of the legislative election convicts the chief executive of the State of ignorance of constitutional law or else of a willful violation of duty, and an indefensible surrender of a high prerogative, and, in either event, leads to evil consequences.

To construe the recitals of the commissions as evidence of a breach of duty by the governor, or of ignorance on his part, is a wide stretch of judicial authority, and certainly no such construction should be resorted to where, as here, it is reasonable and natural to infer that the governor yielded to the influence of the legislative election, not because it coerced him, but because it persuaded or convinced him that the choice or selection was a proper one. It is neither unusual nor improper, as everyone knows, for the governor to consult the officers or citizens, and recommendations are often made to the appointing power in behalf of applicants for office. This is illustrated by the cases where postmasters are designated by an election held by the people; for, while such an election may influence the president to make the appointment, it does not coerce his judgment, and if he should recite in his commission that the person so chosen was appointed because of his election, we suppose no one would think of questioning the validity of the appointment. We have no more right in this instance to assume that the election by the Legislature coerced either Governor Porter or Governor Gray than a court would have to assume, in the case supposed, that the election by the people had coerced the president.

If we are to strictly adhere to the words of the commissions and regard only the letter of the instrument, then the commission given Peelle by Governor Porter is conclusive, for it is written therein that "In the name and by the authority of the State aforesaid I do hereby appoint and commission William A. Peelle, Jr., Chief of the Bureau of Statistics."

If the recitals control, then it is impossible to deny that Governor Porter did appoint Peelle to the office.

Under the appointment made by Governor Porter, Peelle was inducted into the office in 1863, and he continued in office undisturbed until this action was brought, nearly seven years afterwards. For almost seven years he has been in office, and it seems to me very doubtful whether, after such a lapse of time, anyone can be heard to aver that when Governor Porter appointed him there was no vacancy. I am, at all events, thoroughly convinced that the relator cannot question the action of Governor Porter. To aver that there was then no vacancy is to aver that Governor Porter was ignorant of the law. And it is more, for it is to aver that for more than six years all of the executive, legislative and administrative officers of the State were ignorant of the fact, if it be fact, as assumed, that Peelle was a usurper. But still more than this, Mr. Conner, who it is assumed was the incumbent when Peelle was appointed by Governor Porter, yielded the office without objection and asserts no title, for the title is here asserted by one who claims through an appointment made more than six years after the appointee of Governor Porter had taken possession of his office. I know of no authority nor of any principle that will authorize any court or any officer to sit in judgment on the action of Governor Porter at the demand of one whose sole and only claim to the office is an appointment made six years and more after Governor Porter's appointee took possession of the office.

Nor do I believe that it can be justly asserted that from the time Mr. Conner yielded the office it has been vacant. When Peelle entered the office six years ago and more under Governor Porter's appointment the vacancy was filled; or else Mr. Conner is still the officer de jure. That it was in fact filled no one will deny; that it was so in law is my firm conviction. It may be true that when Governor Porter appointed Peelle there was no vacancy, but when Mr. Conner yielded the office, as it is asserted he did do, there was a vacancy and this vacancy was filled by Mr. Peelle's entrance under Governor Porter's appointment. As the sole power of appointing was at that time in Governor Porter, his commission operated to place Peelle in office as soon as the vacancy occurred, and Governor Gray's commission continued him there. It may be true (it is immaterial whether it be so or not) that if Peelle's right had been challenged by Mr. Conner, or if Governor Porter had commissioned another, Peelle could not have rightfully held the office under Governor Porter's commission; but however this may be, it cannot be true that what occurred under executive sanction twice manifested, more than six years ago, can be reviewed at the suit of one whose claim is founded on a commission only a few months old.

It is assumed that Mr. Conner abandoned the office, and if, therefore, it ever became vacant, it became so when Mr. Conner abandoned it in 1833, if he did abandon it, and at that time the governor of the State had an unquestioned right to fill it, and Governor Porter did attempt, at least, to fill it by appointing Mr. Peelle, and the only person who could legally complain was Mr. Conner, for, if Peelle's appointment was invalid, then Mr. Conner, by force of the constitutional provision which rules the question, held over, and he only was wronged.

In this case the relator has the burden of establishing two things: first, the strength of his own title, and, second, the weakness of Peelle's; and if he has weakened Peelle's title it is because he has shown that Mr. Conner was entitled to the office, and has thus shown that he has himself no title. He is "bolst by his own petard." If, as the argument of the relator assumes from beginning to end, the two governors who issued Peelle's commissions were mistaken as to the law, then, so, we must presume, was Mr. Conner, and if he was he did not abandon the office, and he it is who is now, upon the relator's own theory, entitled to the office. If Peelle, by virtue of the unconstitutional statute under which the Legislature assumed to elect him, has kept any person out of office, it is Mr. Conner and not Mr. Worrel. If Mr. Conner were here claiming the office, there would, to my mind, be much more difficulty in vindicating Mr. Peelle's claim; for, if an officer yields to a law believed at the time by the executive and legislative departments of the government to be valid, and is by it coerced out of office, he cannot be adjudged to have abandoned the office. But it is doubtful whether it would be competent, even at the suit of Mr. Conner, to reach back over a period of nearly seven years and review the action of Governor Porter; it is, however, quite clear that it is not competent to do it at the suit of the relator, who was a stranger until May, 1839.

If Peelle wrongfully put anyone out of office by entering into it, that one was Mr. Conner, and if there is anyone who has a claim to the office except Peelle, it is Mr. Conner. If there is, and has been, no vacancy in the office, it must be for the reason that Mr. Conner was never rightfully ousted, and if there was no vacancy when Governor Porter and Governor Gray acted, there was none when Governor Harvey issued the commission to Mr. Worrel six years later.

It is inconsistent to assert that Governor Porter and Governor Gray were coerced into putting Peelle into office and keeping him there by the legislative election, and that all they did was to obey the direction of the Legislature, yielding to it their own judgments and surrendering their own high constitutional prerogatives, and yet hold that Mr. Conner, in yielding to coercive measures that controlled the highest officers of the State, voluntarily abandoned an office to which he was of right entitled. To me it seems illogical to assert that the two governors were so constrained by legislative action that they did not exercise their free judgment and constitutional rights, and yet hold that a subordinate officer, who yielded to the same action of the Legislature, acted of his own free will and uncontrolled judgment, and voluntarily abandoned his office.

If Mr. Conner did not abandon the office he is still the de jure officer, and if he is, the appellant's relator has not the shadow of a claim. Conner did not abandon the office if he merely yielded to the same power which, as the relator asserts, controlled and coerced Governor Porter, and left the office because he was forced by law to do so. It is impossible to conceive how it can with consistency be asserted that there was no vacancy in 1833 because Mr. Conner was the officer de jure, and yet be asserted that, as Mr. Conner was forced out of the office in that year, it lets the relator in six years later. Nor is it easy to conceive any rational theory upon which the relator can lay hold of Mr. Conner's rights to defeat Peelle; for, as Mr. Conner is not before the court, no question as to him can be determined, and certainly no right of Mr. Conner can be made available to the relator, who had not the remotest connection with the case until six years after Peelle, as the relator now claims, wrongfully asserted title against Mr. Conner.

The case seems to me very clear upon principle, but authorities are not wanting.

That executive powers and duties are beyond review by the courts is firmly settled. Smith v. Myers, 100 Ind. 1, and authorities cited page 7, 7 West. Rep. 90.

That the commission of an officer who, as is true of this case, has the sole and exclusive appointing power, is a conclusive expression of the judgment of the officer invested with that power, is affirmed in strongly reasoned cases, and, so far as I have been able to ascertain, is denied by none. In a case where the officer having the sole power of appointment erroneously supposed that he must act upon the action of a legislative body, the court said: "The essential thing is the fact of the appointment. That might have been contained in a letter addressed to the persons appointed or to the public. If the paper was signed for the purpose of making or evidencing the appointment, all else is mere matter of form and unimportant." People v. Fitzsimmons, 68 N. Y. 514.

In another case the court said: "In such a state of case it is only necessary that the person claiming the office shall show that the officer has exercised that power and decided in his favor." Hoke v. Field, 10 Bush, 144, 19 Am. Rep. 58.

That there is no abandonment of a public office where the person yields it in deference to a statute which is afterwards declared to be unconstitutional is adjudged in the very strongly reasoned case of Turnsperd v. Hudson, 60 Miss. 439, 19 Am. Rep. 15, where the authorities are collected and ably reviewed.

That the law is that if Mr. Conner did not abandon the office by yielding to an unconstitutional statute the implied or expressed declaration of Governor Porter or of Governor Gray did not and could not create a vacancy is set tled by our own decisions. Knorr Co. Comrs. v. Johnson (Ind.) 7 L. R. A. 634; State v. Harrison, 118 Ind. 484, 18 West. Rep. 370.

Whatever view may be taken of this case, it seems clear to me that the relator has no title to the office, and if he has not, then there can be no question as to the correctness of the judgment of the trial court. Whether Mr. Peele or Mr. Conner is entitled to the office is a much more doubtful question than the question presented by the relator's assertion of title.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Polk County in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover the amount alleged to be due upon a policy of fire insurance. Affirmed.

Statement by Given, J.:

Action to recover upon a policy of insurance against loss or damage by fire. The petition shows that defendant issued to plaintiff a policy upon property in Pennsylvania, insuring him against loss or damage by fire, for which he paid the premium; that while said policy was in full force the property was totally destroyed by fire, of which he gave notice and proofs of loss as required. The defendant answered in two counts, denying generally in the first, and alleging in the second that it is a corporation organized under the laws of Iowa, with its principal place of business at Des Moines; that it had not, and was not, for want of sufficient capital stock, entitled to qualify under the laws of Pennsylvania to do business in that State, and had no office or agent in that

State, and was not soliciting or doing business therein, when said policy was issued, all of which the plaintiff well knew; that said policy was issued in violation of the laws of Pennsylvania, and therefore void.

The requirements of the laws of Pennsylvania, as set out, are "that, before any insurance company not of that State shall be permitted to transact any insurance business within the State of Pennsylvania, or to issue any policies of insurance upon property within said State, either by itself or agents, a certificate must be obtained of the insurance commissioner of said State certifying that it has so complied with the laws of Pennsylvania, and is authorized to transact such business within the State; that any company, not of said State, that shall do an insurance business within said State without having first qualified itself as provided, and without first receiving the certificate required, shall pay a fine and penalty for such offense to said State." The plaintiff demurred to said second count on the following grounds: (1) The defendant is estopped from alleging its want of authority to do business in the State of Pennsylvania; (2) The statute of Pennsylvania does not render the contract of insurance referred to void; (3) The said count shows that the defendant is liable to a penalty for doing an unauthorized business in the State of Pennsylvania, but shows no defense to the claim of the plaintiff herein; (4) an Ohio corporation does not constitute carrying on a business. Ibid.

Where the Constitution and statutes provide that foreign corporations shall make and file a certificate designating an authorized agent in the State, residing at its principal place of business, upon whom process may be served, a certificate in substantial conformity which designates the "general manager" residing at its principal place of business as agent, without giving any particular name. Goodwin v. Colorado Mortgage Invest. Co. 110 U. S. 1 (28 L. ed. 47).

Georgia.

Under the Georgia Constitution, a purchase, by a railway company in Georgia, of the contract to construct the line of a competitive company, and of the securities of such competitive company, with a view to prevent the construction of such competing line, is illegal and void, and all concerned as to assets resulting therefrom are constituted trustees for those whose rights have been invaded. *Langdon v. A foreign corporation cannot be incorporated into another corporation of the same name under the laws of another State, although the stock ownership is the same in both States. Drummond

It does not appear that the alleged contract of insurance was made in the State of Pennsylvania, and therefore the laws of Pennsylvania regarding insurance would have no effect; (6) the defendant, having issued to the plaintiff its policy of insurance, cannot now allege a violation of law on its part to avoid its liability under said policy. This demurrer was sustained, and defendant excepted. The case was tried to a jury, the principal contention being as to whether notice and proofs of loss had been given as required. On the trial, defendant excepted to certain rulings admitting and excluding testimony, and to certain instructions. The jury found for the plaintiff, and returned with their general verdict a special finding submitted at defendant's request, and their answer, as follows: "When were the proofs of loss received by the defendant at its office in Des Moines, Iowa?" "Within sixty days from the date of the fire." The defendant moved to set aside the verdict on the grounds of the rulings already stated, and the further ground that the verdict of the jury is contrary to the law and evidence, is the result of passion and prejudice, misconduct of the jury, and that the jury failed to answer special interrogatories by defendant. This motion being overruled, judgment was entered upon the verdict, to all of which defendant excepted, and from which it appeals.

Given, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The questions raised and argued on the demurrer may be resolved into the single inquiry, Is the contract of insurance sued upon void? It is alleged that it is void because the defendant had not and was not entitled to qualify under the laws of Pennsylvania, to contract insurance upon property in that State at the time this policy was issued, and because the plaintiff received it knowing that fact. For the purposes of the demurrer these allegations are to be taken as true, and we are to say whether, being true, they render the policy void. Appellant's contention is that the contract was made and policy issued and accepted, in violation of the laws of Pennsylvania, as set out in the answer, and that, the plaintiff having received the policy knowing that fact, the parties are in pari delicto, and the law will not enforce the contract at the suit of either. Appellee contends that the policy was issued and is payable in Iowa, and its validity is therefore to be determined by the laws of Iowa, and that the Statute set out did not forbid the issuing the policy in suit, nor make the same void, but simply declares the Company liable to a fine for issuing it.

2. It does not appear from the answer, nor from it and the petition, where the contract was made, premium paid or policy delivered, nor where it is payable. From the facts that the Company is of Iowa, and the insured property in Pennsylvania, we may infer the contract to have been made in either State as readily as the other. Such being the state of the pleadings, we are not called upon to determine what effect the law of Pennsylvania would have upon this policy as an Iowa contract.

8. The principle that contracts made in violation of law are void is too well established to require citations. "The well-settled general rule is that, when a statute prohibits or attaches a penalty to the doing of an act, the act is void, and will not be enforced, nor will the law assist one to recover money or property which he has expended in the unlawful execution of it. Or, in other words, a penalty implies a prohibition though there are no prohibitory words in the statute, and the prohibition makes the act illegal and void. . . . But, notwithstanding this general rule, it must be apparent to every legal mind that, when a statute annexes a penalty for the doing of an act, it does not always imply such a prohibition as will render the act void." Punghorn v. Westlake, 36 Iowa, 548.

The law of Pennsylvania, as set out, provides that no insurance company not of that State shall insure property therein unless it has a certain amount of capital stock, has complied with certain requirements and has obtained a certificate from the insurance commissioner that it is qualified to do business in that State, and that any such company that shall do business in that State without having first qualified itself, and without first having received a certificate, as prescribed, from the insurance commissioner, "shall pay a fine and penalty for such offense." The evident purpose of such a law is the protection of those paying for insurance upon property in that State. The prohibition and penalty are against the company only. No duty is required of the insured, and no act upon his part expressly prohibited. There is nothing in the law declaring what effect it shall have upon policies issued and accepted as this is alleged to have been. A number of cases are cited by appellant where, in actions brought by the insurance company to enforce rights under the contract of insurance, it was held that statutes similar to that set out were prohibitory and the contracts void; but in none of those cases it is held that they are void as to the assured.

The Minister, 5 Bliss, 883, is a case where in the Statute of Illinois was under consideration. That Statute required foreign insurance companies to produce certain statements, and to procure authority from the auditor of state to transact business within the State, and declared it unlawful for any agent to do business without having first complied with those laws. It was provided that, upon conviction for violating these requirements, punishment by fine or imprisonment, or both, might be imposed. The court says: "Those Statute Laws do not declare void policies issued by foreign companies, through a local agent, in disregard or violation of them. The object of these Statutes was for the security of citizens doing business with such companies, by bringing them as near as possible to local corporations, and also as a provision for revenue. Where a statute prohibits or annexes a penalty to its commission, the act is made unlawful; but it does not follow that the unlawfulness of the act was meant by the Legislature to avoid a contract made in contravention of it. Where a statute is silent and contains nothing from which the contrary can properly be inferred, a contract in contravention of it is void. But the whole statute must be examined in order to decide whether or not it does contain anything from which the contrary can be properly inferred. There is no penalty pronounced against a person for obtaining a policy from, or doing business with, the company that has not complied with the requirements of those Statutes." Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. McMillen, 24 Ohio St. 67, is somewhat in point. That was an action upon a policy of life insurance issued by the plaintiff in error. The company claimed that its failure to comply with a statute similar to that under consideration rendered the policy void. The court says: "Whether the Statute was meant to invalidate policies issued by companies in contravention of its provisions is to be determined from a consideration of the Statute as a whole. The object of the Act is not to make the business of life insurance unlawful. The Statute is designed for the protection of policy holders and others dealing with insurance companies. To this end it is made unlawful for persons to act on behalf of such companies until the provisions of the Statute have been complied with. But we do not think it was intended to devolve on persons dealing with the companies the duty and risk of ascertaining whether they had complied with the Statute. On the contrary, it seems to have been the intention of the Legislature to rely on the penalties imposed as sufficient to insure such compliance."

In Puncheon v. Westlake, supra, the question was whether a contract for the sale of a lot in a plat that had not been recorded was void because of the Statute providing that any person who shall dispose of, or offer for sale, any lot in any town or addition until the plat was acknowledged and recorded, shall forfeit $50 for each lot sold or disposed of. This Statute is similar in several respects to that in question. It is quite as prohibitory. It is addressed to the seller alone. It is for the protection of the purchasers, and imposes no duty upon or prohibition against them. In passing upon the question, this court said: "We are therefore brought to the true test, which is that while, as a general rule, a penalty implies a prohibition, yet the courts will always look to the language of the statute, the subject matter of it, the wrong or evil which it seeks to remedy or prevent and the purpose sought to be accomplished in its enactment; and if, from all these, it is manifest that it was not intended to imply a prohibition, or to render the prohibited act void, the courts will so hold, and construe the statute accordingly." See also Hill v. Smith, Mo., 101 (Iowa) 70; Tootle v. Taylor, 64 Iowa, 620.

It is argued that to hold this contract not prohibited is to defeat the purposes of the law; that it will admit foreign companies to do business subject only to such fines as may be assessed. In view of the language of the law as stated, the absence of express prohibition, and the evident purpose to protect the insured, we are clearly of the opinion that it was not intended to render contracts such as that in suit void. To so hold does not necessarily admit foreign companies to do business in that State in disregard of its laws. The power of the courts is ample to compel, by fine and otherwise, compliance with the law of the State. The contract being valid, the matter demurred to is no defense, and the question of estoppel does not arise. We think the demurrer was properly sustained.

4. On the trial the plaintiff was permitted to testify that he received the policy through Rhem & Van Deine, of Indianapolis, Ind.; that he sent notice by mail, and proofs of loss, to them; and that after sixty days he drew on the defendant, and the draft was returned protested. Anton J. Van Deine was also permitted to testify, over defendant's objection, to the receipt of the notice and proofs of loss from the plaintiff, and that they were forwarded by mail to the defendant. While it is true that Rhem & Van Deine were not the agents of the defendant, yet this testimony only tended to show how and when the notice and proofs were transmitted, and was properly admitted, if such notice and proofs may be given in the manner stated. That they were transmitted through Rhem & Van Deine is immaterial except as it tends to show whether the defendant received them, and when.

5. The court instructed the jury that, if Van Deine mailed the notice and proofs of loss, properly addressed, to the defendant, the presumption is that they were duly received, but that this presumption may be overcome by evidence. Appellant concedes that such is the rule as to the notice, but contends that, as the plaintiff had sixty days in which to furnish proofs of loss, he should be held to proof of their actual delivery. We see no reason for the distinction. The plaintiff was under the same obligation to furnish both.

Hodgkins v. Montgomery Co. Mut. Ins. Co., 84 Barb. 218, is relied upon. That case is not in point, as it turned upon certain express provisions in the policy not found in this. The court instructed the jury that they must find that the notice of the loss was given within a reasonable time. Appellant contends that this was erroneous, as the policy requires that it be given forthwith. We think the terms are so nearly synonymous that no prejudice could have resulted therefrom. We see no error in the instructions in either of the respects alleged. Some objection is made to the sufficiency of the proofs of loss claimed to have been forwarded, but, as no such objection appears to have been made in the lower court, it cannot be considered here.

6. In addition to the alleged errors already considered, it is urged that the court erred in not granting a new trial on the grounds that the verdict is not supported by the testimony, and that the special finding was not properly answered. The fact in question was whether the notice and proofs of loss had been furnished as required. For the plaintiff, there was the testimony of Van Deluse as to addressing, stamping and mailing them, and the presumption that arises therefrom. Against this, there was the testimony of the defendant's officers and clerks who received its mail that no such documents were received. It was properly left to the jury to say whether the documents were received, and they have found that they were. There is surely evidence upon which to so find, and therefore the verdict should not be disturbed on that ground. The special finding was answered as definitely as it could be, under the testimony. There was nothing from which to fix the precise day upon which the proofs of loss were received except as it might be inferred from the time and place they were mailed. It was important to decide whether they were received within the sixty days, and this the jury could and did find as a fact from the testimony. They could not have found with the same certainty the precise day, nor was it material that they should. Our conclusion is that the judgment of the District Court should be affirmed.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Patrick CURRAN
v.
CITY OF BOSTON.

(.....Mass.....)

A city is not liable for injuries resulting from the negligence of officers engaged in the management of a workhouse which it has established purely for the public service and to assist in the performance of its public duty of supporting paupers and criminals, and who also conduct the work incidental to the maintenance of the institution and to the employment of its inmates, although the establishment was voluntarily erected and maintained under legislative permission; and the fact that some revenue is derived by the city from the labor of the inmates is immaterial if the institution is not conducted with a view to pecuniary profit and none is in fact obtained. This is especially true where such officers are appointed and directed by an independent board which is in no way the agent of the city.

(May 28, 1890.)

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to a judgment of the Superior Court for Suffolk County (Barker, J.), entered upon a verdict directed for defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from the negligence of defendant's servants. Overruled.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.
Mr. E. Greenwood for plaintiff.
Mr. R. W. Nason for defendant.

Devens, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff was an inmate of the workhouse or house of industry belonging to the City of Boston, situate on Deer Island, having been convicted of a misdemeanor and having been legally sentenced to confinement there. He was injured while engaged in unloading coal, and it must be presumed was prepared to prove that he, himself, was in the exercise of due care and that the officers and servants employed in this institution were negligent. The single question presented is, whether these officers and servants engaged in conducting the work incidental to the maintenance of the workhouse of the City and to the employment of the inmates thereof (from whose employment it derives a certain amount of revenue), such officers and servants being also engaged in the management of the City's property employed in the business of the workhouse, are agents of the City for whose negligence in the performance of their duties the City is responsible.

It is a general principle that municipal corporations are not liable to private actions for omissions or neglect in the performance of a NOTE.—While a municipal corporation is liable for its own negligence, it is not liable for the negligence of its agents or licensees; nor is it liable for the malfeasance or negligence of its officers or employees acting under ordinances. See Culver v. Streator, 9 L. R. A. 370, 140 Ill. 338.

corporate duty imposed upon them by law, or that of their servants engaged therein, where such city derives no benefit therefrom in its corporate capacity, unless such action is given by statute. Oliver v. Worcester, 103 Mass. 459, and cases cited.

The contention of the plaintiff is that the case at bar is distinguishable because, as a mere volunteer, the City has devoted property intended mainly for corporate purposes to other purposes for its own advantage, as in Oliver v. Worcester, supra; that it has voluntarily undertaken a work partially for the public good with a view to its own advantage and to relieve itself from burdens peculiar to itself, and that it has embarked in an enterprise, partly commercial, from which it receives a partial remuneration for its expenditures out of a special class in the community so that the entire expense of conducting the workhouse is not met by taxation.

While the workhouse was maintained primarily by the City at its own expense, it was not by law compelled to establish this institution. The plaintiff's argument concedes that when established its officers and servants were not selected by the City but by the board of directors of public institutions; but it urges that they are still to be deemed the agents of the City, as the act of establishing such an institution is voluntary, and the imposition of the ministerial duties upon such officers is the act of the municipality, and that it is immaterial, therefore, whether the ministerial duties involved in the administration of such an institution are cast by statute upon a board over whose tenure of office the City has no control.

The authority to erect and maintain a workhouse or almshouse, to relieve therein poor and indigent persons, is given by Pub. Stat., chap. 89, § 1; Gen. Stat., chap. 23, § 1. The same section provides that offenders of the class to which plaintiff belonged are to be there maintained when sentenced thereto by proper authority.

Pub. Stat., chap. 207, § 30, provides that such offenders may be sentenced "for a term not exceeding six months to the house of correction or to the house of industry or workhouse within the city or town where the conviction is had, or to the workhouse if any there is in the city or town in which the offender has a legal settlement, if such town is within the county."

There is no imperative direction that the City shall establish a workhouse, but by law it is responsible for all county charges of the County of Suffolk, and if the convict were sentenced to confinement therein, his expenses would necessarily be paid by it. Pub. Stat. chap. 23, § 1.

By the more general law, any city or town which has in the house of correction an inmate having his settlement in such town is liable for the cost of his support. Pub. Stat. chap. 230, § 61.

By the Statute authorizing the erection and maintenance of workhouses by a city, a mode of performing a strictly public duty is provided for, which cannot be of any pecuniary advantage to the cities or towns instituting them. No such case is presented as exists where a city has undertaken to build particular works, as water-works, sewers, etc., and where a city acts as an agency to carry on an enterprise to some extent commercial in its character for the purpose of furnishing conveniences and benefits to such as choose to pay for them. The element of consideration then comes in and in such cases it is usually held that a liability exists on the part of the city for an injury to an individual through negligence in building or maintaining such works. Tindley v. Salem, 187 Mass. 171; Child v. Boston, 4 Allen, 41; Oliver v. Worcester, supra; Emery v. Lowell, 104 Mass. 13; Merrifield v. Worcester, 110 Mass. 216; Murphy v. Lowell, 134 Mass. 264.

The action of the City in establishing the workhouse was purely for the public service and for the general good in providing for the care and support of offenders for whose maintenance it was responsible. While in some cases the statute enjoins and directs action similar to this, and in others permits it, in either case as there is no element of corporate advantage or of pecuniary profit to the City, it is not to be held responsible because it exercised the option which was given to it to undertake what it did. Haford v. New Bedford, 16 Gray, 297; Plater v. Boston, 104 Mass. 87.

In Tindley v. Salem, supra, the cases in regard to the liability of towns for the acts of servants or agents were carefully collected and considered by Mr. Justice C. Allen. Referring to the distinction attempted to be drawn between negligence of the servants of a town or city in the performance of a duty imperatively required, and one voluntarily assumed by authority of the statute, he remarks: "This distinction does not affect the resulting liability. There are many provisions of statute by which all municipal corporations must do certain things, and may do certain other things, in each instance with a view solely to the general good. In looking at these provisions in detail, it is impossible to suppose that the Legislature have intended to make the distinction a material one in determining the question of corporate liability to private actions. For example, towns must maintain pounds, guide posts and burial grounds; and may establish and maintain hospitals, workhouses or almshouses," etc. "In all these cases the duty is imposed or the authority conferred for the general benefit. The motive and the object are the same, though in some instances the Legislature determines finally the necessity or expediency, and in others leaves the necessity or expediency to be determined by the towns themselves. But when determined, and when the service has been entered upon, there is no good reason why a liability to a private action should be imposed where a town voluntarily enters upon such a beneficial work, and withheld when it performs the service under the requirement of an imperative law."

We are of opinion, therefore, that the City cannot be held liable upon the ground that the workhouse was established by it voluntarily.

Upon another ground, also, the City cannot be held liable for the alleged negligence of the officers and servants engaged with the plaintiff in the work in doing which he was injured. When the City established the workhouse, the inspection, ordering and government thereof were placed by law in the hands of "the board of directors of public institutions," for the County of Suffolk. This was a board of public officers whom the city council of Boston were required to elect by concurrent vote. While certain powers are given to this board by statute and certain ordinances may be passed by the city council, not inconsistent with the Statute, as to the performance of their duties, it is an independent body, in whom is vested the administration of the public institutions. It is not an agent of the City, nor does it perform any duties as such. Stat. 1857, chap. 85.

As the board is not in any proper sense the agent or servant of the City, those whom it employs cannot be so considered. Nor do we perceive any reason why the City should be held responsible because some revenue is derived from the labor of the inmates. It is required that these inmates should be kept at work, by the Statute, but the institution is not conducted with a view to any pecuniary profit. It is not suggested that the expenses of maintaining the workhouse are met by what is derived from the labor of the inmates or that any profit above them is made. Even if the entire expense is not met by taxation, by reason of the profit thus derived, such profit is purely incidental. The object and purpose of the workhouse, and the conduct of it, are not thus shown to be of the nature of a business. It only appears that as a public institution it is managed in a judicious and economical manner.

It was therefore correctly ruled that the plaintiff could not maintain his action against the City, and that his remedy, if any, was against the officers and servants alleged to be guilty of negligence, by which he claimed to have been injured.

Exceptions overruled.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Pedro MORA Y LEDON et al., Appts.,

v.

Frederick C. HAVEMEYER et al., Respds.

(.....N. Y.)

1. The word "shipment" in a contract purchasing 1,000 tons of sugar "for shipment within thirty days, by sail or steam, seller's option," and providing for marine insurance by the buyers, means the delivery of the sugar within the time required on some vessel destined to the proper port, which the seller has reason to suppose will sail within a reasonable time after shipment, and does not mean a clearance of the vessel as well as putting the goods on board, where there is nothing to indicate that the seller was expected to exercise any control over the clearance of the vessel or of her subsequent management.

2. Shipment of goods which do not constitute a full cargo is sufficiently made by placing them on board a vessel bound for the intended port, and engaged in an honest effort to obtain a cargo for such port.

APPPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of the New York Circuit in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover the contract price for certain sugar alleged to have been sold and delivered to defendants. Reversed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. Noah Davis, with Messrs. Arnold & Greene, for appellants:

The title of the sugar passed to the buyers on delivery of the same to the steamer for transportation, and the execution by the master of "the shipping documents" completed the sale and delivery on the 7th day of March, 1885, two days before the expiration of the thirty days. The shipment was therefore completed within thirty days.

The word "shipment," when used in connection with a contract of sale and purchase, S. L. R. A.

means the delivery to the master or carrier for transportation, the putting the same on board and the making by the master and delivery to the shipper of a bill of lading or "shipping documents" therefor.

Mr. John E. Parsons, for respondents:

In this case the contract was for the purchase in New York of sugar to be transported by the plaintiffs from Cuba to New York, and there to be delivered to the defendants. In such a case "shipment within thirty days" means that within that time the sugar shall be started by ship from the place from which it is to be transported.

The cases which hold that "shipment" means loading or putting on board will be found to involve either bills of lading or contracts, the context of which shows that that was what was intended by the parties.

Ruger, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The sole question involved in this case is the interpretation to be given to the language "for shipment within thirty days by sail or steam, seller's option," as used in an executory contract for the sale by the plaintiffs to defendants of 1,000 tons of Cuba Muscovado sugar, upon which the buyers were to provide marine insurance. The contract was made on February 7, 1886, in New York, where the vendees resided, the vendors being residents of Cuba, and the sugar was intended to be shipped from some port in that island to the defendants at New York. The evidence shows that the shipment of the sugar was begun on the steamer Gladiolus at Sagua, in Cuba, on the 5th and completed on the 7th day of March, 1886, when the master of the vessel delivered to the plaintiffs a bill of lading certifying to the shipment "in good order and condition by Messrs. Mora, Ona & Co. (the plaintiffs), for account and risk of Messrs. Havemeyer & Elder (the defendants), on board the Br. str. called the Gladiolus, whereof Sinclair is master, now lying at the Port of Sagua la Grande, Cuba, and bound for New York, . . . fifteen hundred hogsheads of Muscovado sugar."

The steamer did not, in fact, clear from the port until the 18th of March, and arrived in New York on the 17th of the same month.

It further appears that the full capacity of the Gladiolus was 1,600 tons, and freight room to New York for 1,000 tons only was hired of her charterer by the plaintiffs. It also appeared that the vessel was detained by the charterer, without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiffs, so far as appears, at Sagua for six days after the sugar was shipped, seeking for freight to fill out her complement. The sugar and bills of lading were duly tendered to the defendants in New York by the plaintiffs' agents on the day of the arrival of the Gladiolus in that city, and they refused to receive them upon the grounds stated in a letter, of which the following is a copy:

New York, March 17, 1886.

Messrs. Perkins & Welsh, Agts.:

Gentlemen—We beg to inclose draft and documents for the cargo Gladiolus. We decline to accept the cargo, as the terms of the contract were not complied with. The ship should have cleared the 10th inst. at the latest, and was detained seeking cargo much beyond a reasonable time after shipment.

Yours very truly,

Havemeyer & Elder.

Other evidence was given upon the trial, but none which bears upon the point involved in the case. After the evidence was closed, the defendants asked the court to direct a verdict for them, upon the following grounds:

First. That the plaintiffs failed to comply with the contract of sale.

Second. That the contract required shipment within thirty days, and it appears that the sugar was not shipped until after the expiration of that time.

The court granted the motion and the plaintiffs duly excepted thereto. The judgment entered upon this verdict was affirmed at general term, and from that affirmation this appeal is taken. Upon the trial the plaintiffs objected to the direction of a verdict by the court, and if there was any evidence in the case presenting questions of fact, it was error for the trial court to take it from the jury. The motion for a verdict was put by the defendants upon a single ground, viz.: that the evidence did not show a shipment of the sugar by the plaintiffs within thirty days after the date of the contract, and the determination of this appeal depends upon the question whether such shipment was made within the time mentioned.

If the ground stated be literally construed, it is obvious that it has no support in the evidence, for the sugar was concededly shipped within the thirty days. If we refer to the defendants' letter of refusal, we find that the shipment of the sugar within the stipulated time is distinctly conceded; but they claim that the nonperformance of the contract referred to consisted in the fact that the vessel did not sail immediately after the expiration of the thirty days, and the question to be determined is whether the language of the contract required the clearance of the vessel, as well as the loading of the ship, within the stipulated time. This was the ground upon which the trial court based its judgment, and the general term have placed their affirmance substantially upon the same ground. Some allusions are made in the opinion below to the bona fides of the shipment; but that question, if in the case at all, was a disputed question, and could not be made a reason for sustaining a judgment which might otherwise be erroneous. If there was evidence in the case tending to show bad faith on the part of the plaintiffs in making the shipment, it presented a question of fact for the jury, upon which the parties were entitled to take their verdict. We think the language of the contract is not susceptible of the construction given to it by the courts below. This contract, like all others, must be construed with reference to the intent of the parties making it, and if its language is plain and unambiguous, it must be given that construction which the language fairly imports, and the question of its meaning is a question of law for the court. That meaning, we think, is the putting the goods sold on board a vessel bound for New York, with the intent in good faith to have them cleared for the port of destination in the regular course of trade, or in a reasonable time after the shipment.

The appellants claim that the place of delivery for the goods sold under this contract was the sailing port, and that when they were shipped in conformity to the terms of the contract title passed to the vendees, and the goods were thereafter to be transported at their risk. This is claimed to have been indicated, among other provisions, by that requiring the vendees to make marine insurance. Mos v. McNider, 100 N. Y. 500, 12 Cent. Rep. 776.

It is unnecessary to decide this question as it has no controlling influence over the signification of the word "shipment," as used in the contract. That question, we think, is made clear by general usage and the uniform course of authority on the point. There is nothing in the language used in the contract, or in the surrounding circumstances, to indicate that the vendors were expected to exercise any control over the clearance of the vessel, or her subsequent management. That event might be governed by the condition of the tide, the direction of the wind, the facilities for clearance and many other circumstances over which the vendors had no control and could not have been supposed to have had when the contract was made. These were matters for the judgment of those navigating the vessel. No qualifying adjectives are prefixed to the word "shipment" in the contract, and it clearly defines the kind of shipment intended to be made, which was one made upon a steam or sailing vessel within thirty days from the date of the contract. It is, of course, implied by this language, and the surrounding circumstances, that the shipment was to be made in Cuba upon a vessel bound for New York, and if there was no regular line making trips to the port of destination from the shipping port, that the plaintiffs would supply, in some way, the means of transportation to perform the service required.

In an ordinary contract for the sale of goods to be shipped from one place to another, between which there are regular lines of transportation, it would not be supposed that the vendor was under obligation to exercise control over the medium of transportation after the goods were delivered to the carrier, or be responsible for delays in forwarding them to their place of destination. In the absence of regular lines of transportation some variations in the obligations of the vendor would be necessary, and those rules should be applied which are reasonable under the circumstances of the case and such as would naturally be indicated by the nature and requirements of the contract. In cases where the vendor is to pay the freight and the goods are not sufficient to complete a cargo, it would seem to be reasonable that, in his own interest, he should be authorized to select a vessel which had or could obtain a full cargo and thus diminish the charges on his consignment.

We think the plaintiffs, under this contract, were not required to hire a special ship for the purpose of transporting the goods, if that object could be otherwise reasonably attained; but they, undoubtedly, would be bound to ship on some vessel destined for the Port of New York, which they had reason to suppose would sail within a reasonable time after shipment had been made. In a case where the goods sold would not constitute a full cargo, it would seem to be a sufficient compliance with the contract to put them, within the specified time for shipment, on board a vessel bound for the intended port and engaged in an honest effort to obtain a cargo for such port. If the vendors in good faith shipped goods upon such a vessel, having reason to suppose she would sail within a reasonable time after shipment, we think it would be all the vendees could require under the contract, and if they desired a more speedy performance it should have been specially provided for by agreement. There is no language in the contract requiring the clearance of the vessel or the arrival of the goods at any particular time, and the option given to the vendors to ship by sail or steam evidently contemplated some latitude in respect to the time for the arrival of the goods in New York. A shipment by steam on the 5th of February, or by sail on the 5th of March, would, either, have brought the vendors within the strict terms of the contract. The possible time for the receipt of the goods by the vendees would, in case of an immediate clearance under these conditions, have fluctuated between the 19th day of February and the last day of the succeeding March, and shows some indifference on their part as to the particular time of their arrival in New York. It seems, therefore, quite clear that the goods arrived in New York and were tendered to the vendees within the time contemplated by the contract for their arrival, and the defendants have not been injured by delay in their shipment, unless the terms of the contract have in some way been violated by the plaintiffs. To bring themselves within this exception the defendants claim that the word "shipment," as used in the contract, means a clearance of the vessel, as well as the putting the goods on board, within the period allowed for shipment. The words "shipment" and "shipped" are now used indifferently to express the idea of goods delivered to carriers for the purpose of being transported from one place to another, over land as well as water, and imply, with respect to carriage by land, a completed act, irrespective of the time or mode of transportation. Quintine v. Hellman, 47 N. Y. 453, Misher v. Minot, 10 Gray, 290, Schmertz v. Dwyer, 53 Pa. 335.

The same signification has, so far as we have discovered, uniformly been given to them by lexicographers, when applied to transportation, either by land or water. Thus Webster defines "shipment" to mean "the act of putting anything on board of a ship or other vessel," Worcester, "the act of shipping or putting on board a ship." Abbott's, Bouvier's and Rapalje & Lawrence's Law Dictionaries each give substantially the same definitions.

We have been referred to no authorities supporting the defendants' contention, and we believe it to be contrary to the invariable meaning of the word, as defined by lexicographers, as understood by the mercantile community generally or as laid down in the decisions of the courts. A leading case on this subject in England is that of Brown v. Shand, L. R. 3 App. Cas. 455, H. of L., which seems to us to be in point. The contract in that case provided for the purchase of a quantity of rice "to be shipped at Madras . . . during the months of March and April;" and the question was whether rice mainly put on board during the month of February, with bills of lading taken therefor, was a compliance with this contract, although a small part of the cargo was not put on board, nor did the vessel sail until the month of March; and it was held that it was not. The case was ably and exhaustively discussed by the Lord Chancellor and the law lords generally, and the court were unanimously of the opinion that the word "shipped," according to its natural and ordinary signification, as well as its meaning in the mercantile community, was the putting of the goods on board the vessel and taking a bill of lading therefor; and it was accordingly held that rice put on board in February was not shipped in March or April, although the vessel did not, in fact, sail until March.

Delivering an opinion in that case, Lord Hatterly quite emphatically said: "I think the meaning of the word 'shipped' is sufficiently understood by this time in commerce. But if it were needed, I think we have sufficient evidence before us that by the word 'shipped' all the witnesses understand 'put on board.' Evidently if the sailing of the vessel containing the cargo was any part of the act of shipment, that case should have been otherwise decided." To a similar effect was the case of Reuter v. Sala, L. R. 4 C. P. Div. 239.

Chief Justice Shaw in Fisher v. Minot, 10 Gray, 260, says: "The word 'shipped,' in common maritime and mercantile usage, means 'placed on board of a vessel for the purchaser or consignee to be transported at his risk'; and such a delivery is a constructive delivery to the purchaser. . . . 'Shipment' means delivery on board." See also Stubbs v. Lund, 7 Mass. 458; Newhall v. Vargas, 13 Me. 105.

It has been urged by the respondents that the case of Tobias v. Lisberger, 105 N. Y. 404, 7 Cent. Rep. 728, is in conflict with this definition; but we do not so regard it. In that case the contract was for the sale of "about 100 tons of old iron vignol rails for prompt shipment by sail from Europe." The term "shipment" was there qualified by the word "prompt" and it was held, the vendor having an option of ports from which to ship, that a delivery of iron on board a vessel in a port blockaded by ice, which could not in the regular course of nature be opened for an indefinite period, was not a "prompt shipment" within the meaning of those terms. The distinction between the cases is too obvious to need comment.

The respondents have referred to certain evidence, which it is suggested tended to show bad faith on the part of the plaintiffs in making this shipment. There is certainly not sufficient evidence of that kind to make a question of law for the court, and it would be going quite as far as is warranted to say there is enough to carry it to a jury.

The judgments of the courts below should be reversed, and a new trial ordered, with costs to abide the event.

All concur.

2. The equitable remedy for the cancellation of town bonds may be refused by reason of long delay and acquiescence on the part of the town and its taxpayers, accompanied by frequent acts recognizing the validity of the bonds, although the delay is not continued for the statutory period of limitation of equitable actions.

3. The inability of a municipal corporation to make valid, by acquiescence or recognition, obligations which it had no power to create, will not prevent consideration of such matters in determining whether it shall be denied a remedy because of laches.

A statutory period of limitation of equitable actions is not, where a purely equitable remedy is invoked, equivalent to a direction that no shorter period shall be a bar to relief in any case, and does not preclude a denial of relief, for unreasonable delay, in accordance with equitable principles.

5. The failure for nearly ten years of a town and its taxpayers to give warning or protest against dealing with or taking its void bonds, with affirmative acts of recognition encouraging investment therein as safe and valid securities, is sufficient to defeat an equitable action for their cancellation.

6. An injunction will not be granted in favor of taxpayers to restrain payment to the holders of void town bonds of moneys which have been collected without hindrance or protest for the special purpose of paying interest thereon, while the bonds were apparently valid and before any adjudication against them.

Mr. John B. Glendon, for respondents:

The decision in the case of Craig v. Andes, 93 N. Y. 406, was procured by a fraud upon this court and upon the defendants here, and is of no authority.

Murdock v. Aiken, N. Y. Ct. App. 1803 (not reported), cited in People v. Mead, 96 N. Y. 224.

Andrews, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was commenced January 6, 1882, by the plaintiffs, certain taxpayers of the Town of Andes, in the County of Delaware, in behalf of themselves and all other taxpayers in said town, against the Delhi & Middletown Railroad Company, the supervisor of said town, and certain other defendants, holders of bonds to the amount of about $50,000, dated September 1, 1871, part of $98,000 of bonds with interest coupons attached, purporting to have been issued by commissioners in behalf of said town, under and in pursuance of chapter 907 of the Laws of 1869, in aid of the construction of the Delhi & Middletown Railroad. The complaint sets forth that the bonds were issued without authority and were void for the reason, among others, that the proper consents required by the Act of 1869 were not obtained, and demanded equitable relief, first, that the defendant Ballantine, supervisor of said town, be restrained and enjoined from paying the interest falling due on such bonds March 1 and September 1, 1882, out of the sum of $5,650, in his hands, levied and collected for the payment of such interest; and second, that the bonds held by the individual defendants be decreed to be delivered up and canceled.

The question of the validity of the bonds of the Town of Andes, issued under the Act of 1869, was presented to and adjudicated by this court in the case of Craig v. Andes, 93 N. Y. 406. It was there decided, for reasons disclosed in the prevailing opinion, that the bonds were void. That action was brought after the commencement of the present one, to recover interest on certain of the bonds, which fell due March 1, 1882. It now appears from the evidence in this action that the Craig suit was brought at the instance of Ballantine, the supervisor of the town, and the trial judge found "that the coupons on which the action was brought were paid for out of the moneys of said town, and said action was prosecuted by attorneys paid by said town and was defended by attorneys paid by said town; said town paying all the expenses thereof, and the suit was brought and defended for the purpose of procuring the bonds of said town to be declared invalid."

We fully assent to the claim of the counsel for the bondholders, that an adjudication obtained under such circumstances ought not to stand in the way of a re-examination by the court of the grounds upon which it proceeded, and if we were now satisfied either that upon the facts presented in that case the question of law was erroneously decided, or that facts not disclosed on the trial of the Craig Case, but now brought out, would, if then disclosed, have led to a different result, the circumstances stated would emphasize the duty of the court to correct its errors, or to conform its judgment in the present case to the new circumstances.

It is claimed that material facts bearing upon the validity of the bonds, not shown on the trial of the Craig Case, were proved on the trial of the present one, prominent among which is the fact, which now appears, that the railroad in aid of which the bonds were issued had been in fact legally located on the identical route specified in the conditional consents, prior to May 6, 1871, the date of the presentation of the petition and consents to the county judge. But we deem it unnecessary to determine whether the new facts presented affect the principle of our former decision, for the reason that we think the judgment below dismissing the complaint in this action was properly rendered, assuming the invalidity of the bonds.

It will be convenient to consider separately the two purposes of this action, viz.: the surrender and cancellation of the bonds held by the individual defendants, and the separate and distinct relief by injunction to prevent the defendant Ballantine from applying the money in his hands to the payment of interest. The jurisdiction of a court of equity to compel the surrender and cancellation of written instruments obtained by fraud, or which being void for any reason may, if outstanding, subject the plaintiff to loss or injury, is very ancient and has been frequently exercised. The plaintiff seeking this relief invokes the equitable powers of the court, and the court grants or refuses it in the exercise of a sound discretion, according to the circumstances of the particular case.

The granting of this relief cannot be claimed as a matter of "absolute right ex debito iustitie," such as a party has to recover an amount due on a contract or for damages for a tort." The existence of jurisdiction, and the fact that plaintiff makes out that the instrument of which he seeks the surrender and cancellation is void, are not conclusive of his right to a final decree in his favor. The court may, nevertheless, refuse to exercise the jurisdiction, and leave the party to his defense at law when the instrument is sought to be enforced against him. But in entertaining or declining jurisdiction the court does not act capriciously, but is guided by principles which have gradually been evolved in the course of adjudication. It is apart from our present purpose to arrange or classify the cases upon the subject. The general grounds of jurisdiction, and the circumstances which justify equitable interference, or, on the other hand, the denial of equitable relief, are set forth in the text-books and illustrated by decided cases. We refer to a few of the decisions in this court upon the subject. Heywood v. Buffalo, 14 N. Y. 540, Venus v. Woodruff, 63 N. Y. 403; Springport v. Tontona Sav. Bank, 73 N. Y. 397.

The facts in the present case present several elements which have entered into the consideration of the court in granting relief for the cancellation of written instruments. The bonds of the Town of Andes are, as we have assumed, void, and since the commencement of this action they have been so adjudicated, but the adjudication is an estoppel only as between the parties to the action in which it was made. The other bondholders are not concluded, and may contest over again the question of the validity of the bonds. There exists also the further element that the bonds are not void on their face, and that in a suit brought thereon the proof of the adjudication of the county judge that the requisite consents had been obtained would presumptively establish performance of the condition as to consents in the Bonding Act, and cast upon the town the onus of disproving it, and showing that, in fact, the requisite consents had not been given. Craig v. Andes, 93 N. Y. 410.

It also appears by the record that the bonds are held by numerous parties, each of whom might bring an action at law to enforce them, unless prevented by the equitable interposition of the court for their cancellation. In the case of Springport v. Tontona Sav. Bank, supra, 73 N. Y. 400, the court sustained an action for the cancellation of town bonds, upon facts substantially similar to those presented in this case, with the important exception, however, that there the town had acted promptly in repudiating the bonds and in seeking to review the proceedings under which the right to issue them was claimed. In that case the adjudication of the assessor was made March 18, 1871. The town procured a writ of certiorari to review and set aside the bonding proceedings, April 10, 1871, and they were set aside in that proceeding by the judgment of this court in June, 1872. The defendants purchased the bonds in September, 1871, pending the litigation on the certiorari, and in January, 1873, the suit for cancellation was commenced. The town had paid no interest on the bonds and refused in any way to recognize their validity.

This court, also, in the case of Metzger v. Atties & A. R. Co., 79 N. Y. 171, affirmed a judgment cancelling town bonds issued in aid of the Attica & Arcade Railroad Company, on the ground that they were issued without authority. The bonds in that case were delivered by town commissioners to the railroad company in exchange for its stock March 21, 1874. The suit for cancellation was commenced in January, 1876, less than two years thereafter. The commissioners were joined with the railroad company as defendants in the action, and the complaint alleged collusion between the defendants to impose the bonds upon the town. The bonds had not been transferred by the company and the town had paid no interest.

The case of Meigs v. Cook, 108 N. Y. 304, 21 Cent. Rep. 310, sustained a decision of the special term of the supreme court decreeing the cancellation of town bonds, on the ground of a defect in the petition by which the proceedings to bond the town were initiated. The road in aid of which the bonds were issued had never been constructed, and after paying interest on the bonds for a single year, the town repudiated its liability and commenced an action for their cancellation.

The present case, for the first time in the history of the litigations growing out of the Town Bonding Acts in the aid of railroads in this State, presents the question whether the equi-able remedy for cancellation may be refused by reason of long delay and acquiescence on the part of the town and its taxpayers, accompanied meanwhile by frequent acts recognizing the validity of the obligations of which cancellation is sought, although the delay in bringing the action has not continued for the full statutory period of limitation of equitable actions. It is important to state the material facts bearing upon the question. The adjudication of the county judge that the persons who signed the petition in the bonding proceedings constituted a majority of the taxpayers of the Town of Andes in number and amount of taxable property, was made May 29, 1871. The bonds (except a part not now material) were issued and delivered to the Railroad Company in exchange for its stock between June 10 and December 10, 1872. They were payable in thirty years from date, with semi-annual interest at 7 per cent. In each year for nine years and more a tax was levied on the town to pay the interest on the bonds, and it was regularly paid as it accrued up to September 1, 1881, and in 1878 the town meeting voted a tax of $8,000 to pay that amount of bonds, and they were so paid and retired. The railroad in aid of which the bonds were issued was never put in operation. But the Company during 1872, 1873 and 1874 expended in grading and other construction, within the Town of Andes, a sum greater than the amount of bonds issued by the town. In 1874 a town meeting was held pursuant to chapter 458 of the Laws of 1874, to determine whether the town commissioners should be authorized to sell the stock taken in exchange for the bonds, and it was decided that such authority should not be given. In 1875, on a new vote being taken under chapter 153 of the Laws of 1875, a sale was authorized. The stock was not sold, and in December, 1881, was practically extinguished by a sale of the railroad under foreclosure. This action was commenced December 6, 1881, more than ten years after the adjudication of the county judge, and nine years and more, but less than ten years, after the issue of the bonds. The trial judge found that the individual defendants purchased the bonds held by them in good faith, paying therefor not less than par and accrued interest, without notice of any claim by the officers or taxpayers of the town that there was any defense thereto or any suspicion of their invalidity.

It cannot be doubted that if obligations of an individual having general power to contract had been issued without his authority, but he had afterwards permitted them to be dealt with by the public as valid securities, and had recognized their validity by frequent payment of interest, and by payment of a portion of the principal, these acts would have constituted a ratification of the unauthorized obligations, and have precluded the obligor from denying their validity. Under the decisions in this State similar acts on the part of a town or other municipality, recognizing the validity of bonds issued under the Bonding Acts, would not estop the municipality issuing them from denying their validity on the ground that essential conditions provided in the Bonding Acts had not been complied with. By our decisions, the obtaining of consents to the extent, and in the mode, prescribed in the Acts, is of the very substance of the power conferred upon municipal corporations to issue bonds for the purposes contemplated, and bonds issued without the requisite consents are held to have been issued without authority. Municipal corporations, since they possess no general authority to issue such bonds, cannot by recognition or subsequent ratification validate obligations which they had no power to create. This point was involved in Craig v. Andes, where the question of estoppel was raised and overruled, and the decision on this point accords with the tenor of the cases in this State. See Weismar v. Douglas, 64 N. Y. 105; Caprin v. Hancock, 84 N. Y. 542; Storia v. Genoa, 29 N. Y. 439.

The dismissal of the complaint in this action cannot, therefore, rest upon the ground of estoppel or ratification, but the acts of the town, its long acquiescence, without action or protest, in the bonding proceedings, its repeated recognition of the validity of the bonds by payments, are pertinent considerations where the court is called upon, after a long delay, to exert its equitable powers in decreeing their surrender and cancellation.

It is, and always has been, the practice of courts of equity to remain inactive where a party seeking their interference has been guilty of unreasonable laches in making his application. Story, Eq. Jur. § 1530.

The principle is stated with great force and clearness by Lord Camden, in Smith v. Clay, Amb. 645. "Nothing can call forth this court into activity but conscience, good faith and reasonable diligence. Where these are wanting the court is passive and does nothing. Laches and neglect are discountenanced, and therefore, from the beginning of this court, there was always a limitation to suits in this court."

Courts of equity, it has been said, act not so much in analogy to, as in obedience to, Statutes of Limitation of legal actions, because where the legal remedy is barred, the spirit of the Statute bars the equitable remedy also.

In the present case the cause of action for the cancellation of the bonds was not barred by the ten years' Statute applicable to equitable actions. But a period of nine years had elapsed after the bonds were issued, before the commencement of the action. But we apprehend that the period of limitation of equitable actions fixed by the Statute is not, where a purely equitable remedy is invoked, equivalent to a legislative direction that no period short of that time shall be a bar to relief in any case, or precludes the court from denying relief in accordance with equitable principles for unreasonable delay, although the full period of ten years has not elapsed since the cause of action accrued. The ten years' limitation was primarily designed to shield defendants (Buffalo & N. Y. C. R. Co. v. Dudley, 14 N. Y. 853), and it must be true that a court, in the exercise of its equitable jurisdiction, could not entertain or enforce a cause of action barred by the Statute, and not within any exception, acting upon any general equitable considerations. But in enforcing purely equitable remedies, depending upon general equitable principles, unreasonable and inexcusable delay is an eloment in the plaintiff's case which a court of equity always takes into consideration in exercising its discretion to grant or refuse relief, and is not a mere collateral incident. Where there is a remedy at law whereby the plaintiff can prosecute or defend his legal right, the refusal of relief leaves the parties where they were.

If there are special circumstances which may change the situation of the plaintiff to his injury, unless the equitable remedy is interposed, this fact may be considered. But the right of the court to deny relief, upon equitable grounds, for long delay, although short of the statute period of limitation, is in the nature of a defense, and is not we think taken away by the Statute. There may be a well founded distinction between the case of an application for an equitable remedy in aid of, or to enforce, a legal right not barred by the Statute, and the case where an exclusively equitable remedy is sought, such as to restrain proceedings at law, or, upon the principle quia timeo, to deprive an adversary of the muniment of his alleged legal right, which he inequitably retains. In cases of the latter class, long delay or acquiescence, although short of the statute period for the limitation of equitable actions, may be a ground for refusing relief. Pom. Eq. Jur § 817.

The cancellation of securities is a purely equitable remedy and cannot be claimed as an absolute right, nor is it applied for or awarded in aid of a legal right or title.

We conclude, therefore, that it was within the power of the court to dismiss the complaint so far as relief was sought for a cancellation of the bonds, on the ground of delay in bringing the action. The circumstances justified the conclusion on this branch of the case. The town and the taxpayers permitted the bonds to be dealt with and taken by the savings banks and others, for nearly ten years not only without, so far as appears, a word of warning or protest, but by affirmative acts of recognition encouraged investment therein as safe and valid securities. The bonds, resting on the adjudication of the county judge, were apparently valid. The Legislature has still the power to ratify them and make them valid obligations of the town. Williams v. Duaneburg, 86 N. Y. 129, Horton v. Thompson, 71 N. Y. 513, Hepers v. Stephens, 86 N. Y. 623.

They are now in the hands of bona fide holders, that is, of persons who have paid value for them without notice. The fact that if the plaintiffs are defeated here, the bonds may be sued upon and enforced in another jurisdiction, constitutes no equitable reason for maintaining the action. Venues v. Woodruff, supra.

The judgment denying relief for the cancellation of the bonds is incidentally supported by the opinion in Craig v. Andes, wherein the learned judge by whom it was pronounced, referring to the judgment in the present case in the supreme court, said: "Nor is the correctness of that decision in question here, for a court of equity might, in its discretion, refuse to interfere and leave the party to his legal rights;" and in Alford v. Syracuse Sav. Bank, 96 N. Y. 599, Judge Finch recognizes the doctrine that a court of equity would not lend its aid in a case of inexcusable laches of the party seeking relief. The denial of relief in this case may result practically in the enforcement of the bonds in question and also of other town bonds issued and held under similar circumstances. But in contrasting the relative conduct and situation of the town and the taxpayers on the one side and the purchasers of bonds on the other, we cannot say that such a result will be repugnant to any principle of justice or equity.

The right of the plaintiffs to maintain the action, so far as it seeks to enjoin and restrain the defendant Ballantine from paying the interest on the bonds for the year 1882, out of money in his hands, levied and collected for that purpose, depends upon the question whether such payment, if made, would be an illegal act or constitute waste under chapter 581 of the Laws of 1881. This Act, which superseded the original legislation on the subject initiated by chapter 161 of the Laws of 1879, is entitled "An Act for the Protection of Taxpayers," and in its first section authorized an action to be prosecuted by taxpayers against officers, agents, commissioners or other persons acting in behalf of any county, town, village or municipal corporation, "to prevent any illegal act on the part of any such officers, agents, commissioners or other persons, or to prevent waste or injury to any property, funds or estate of such county, town, village or municipal corporation."

By Act, chapter 284, of the Laws of 1879, the office of railroad commissioner in the several towns in Delaware County was abolished, and the duties appertaining thereto were imposed upon the supervisors of the several towns. It was made the duty of the supervisor of each town to report to the board of supervisors, each year, the amount of interest on railroad bonds of the town falling due in that year, and the Act provides "that the said amount shall be raised by tax as now provided by law, and paid by the collectors of the taxes to the said supervisors, and by them applied in payment of the interest and coupons aforesaid." The defendant, Ballantine, as supervisor of the Town of Andes, in the fall of 1881, reported to the board of supervisors of Delaware County the amount required to be raised to pay the interest falling due on the railroad bonds of the town, for the year 1882, viz.: the sum of $6,650, and the board of supervisors, at its annual session in the fall of 1881, included in its warrant for the collection of taxes in the Town of Andes the sum so reported, and this amount was duly collected and paid over to the supervisor pursuant to the direction of such warrant, for the purpose of paying the interest on the bonds, and the sum so collected remains in his hands. The plaintiffs in their character as taxpayers seek to prevent the supervisor of the Town of Andes from performing the duty imposed upon him by the Act of 1879, and from applying the money for the purpose for which it was raised.

We are of opinion that the payment by the supervisor of the interest on the bonds, out of the funds, would neither be an illegal act, nor constitute waste within the Statute of 1881. The bonds were, under the adjudication of the county judge, presumptively valid obligations of the town. When the money in question was raised, their validity had not been impeached by any judicial decision. The town had, for a long time, recognized their validity. The taxpayers acquiesced for many years in the measures taken to raise money by taxation to pay the interest on the bonds. In 1874 and 1875, in their collective capacity in town meetings, they voted upon the question of the sale of the stock held by the town, at elections held under Acts of the Legislature in these years, which Acts, while they did not have the effect of legalizing the bonds which were the consideration for the stock authorized to be sold, nevertheless assumed their validity.

The bonds were not illegal or void in the sense that they were fraudulently issued or issued without consideration. They were exchanged for stock, and the Railroad Company concurrently with the subscription therefor entered into an agreement with the railroad commissioners that the proceeds of the bonds should be used for the construction and equipment of the railroad within the Town of Andes, and this agreement was performed. It is not claimed that there was any fraud or collusion in the bonding proceedings. The bondholders are innocent holders for full value of the securities thus issued. It is very clear, we think, that neither the town nor the taxpayers would be permitted to recover back money actually paid by the town to the bondholders as money illegally paid and received. It was paid upon presumptively valid obligations, under a claim of right on their part to receive it, and if payments actually made by the officers of the town would be valid and binding, it would not, we think, be an illegal act on the part of the supervisor, under the Act of 1881, to apply the money now in his hands according to the direction of the Statute, simply for the reason that the validity of the bonds is now questioned.

The question of the duty of the officer holding money raised to pay interest on bonds issued under the Town Bonding Acts to make such payment, notwithstanding some omission or defect in the bonding proceedings, which rendered the bonds invalid, has been considered by this court in several cases. People v. Brown, 55 N. Y. 180; Oxford First Nat. Bank v. Wheeler, 72 N. Y. 201.

We held in each of these cases that an officer who had in his hands money collected to pay interest on town bonds could not be permitted to question their validity when called upon to pay it over to those entitled to it under the Statute. In one case the collector of the town refused to pay the money collected by him to the town commissioners, as required by the Act, and in the other the town commissioners, after they had received it, refused to pay it to the bondholders, and in the case last cited the action of a bondholder to compel such payment was sustained. In both cases the defense was made that the bonds were void, and in both the defense was interposed pursuant to resolutions of the town meeting of the town whose bonds were in question.

The money, the payment of which is sought to be restrained in this action, has been collected in usual course from the taxable property in the Town of Andes. Neither the town nor the taxpayers intervened to prevent its collection. So far as appears the taxpayers paid the money voluntarily and have no recourse to recover it back. The money does not belong to them, nor in a strict sense is it the property of the town. It was raised for a special purpose, and it can be applied legally to no other. The Act of 1881 should have a broad and liberal construction to accomplish the purposes of its enactment. But it is difficult to perceive how that can be treated as an illegal act, or as constituting waste, the performance of which may be compelled by mandamus. We do not doubt that taxpayers may by means of this statutory action arrest the payment of money collected to pay fraudulent or collusive claims against a town having neither a legal nor equitable foundation. We confine our judgment to a case of money raised to pay a claim apparently valid, which has been so treated by the town and its taxpayers, having implied legislative sanction, and where no fraud is imputed. In such case we think the taxpayers cannot arrest the payment under the Act of 1881. If in this case judgment was given for a cancellation of the bonds, then it might follow that the fund would be left where it is, as there would be no debt in fact or in form to which it could be applied. See Metzger v. Attica & A. R. Co. supra.

We think the judgment should be affirmed.

(April 15, 1885.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of the New York Special Term sustaining demurrers to the complaint in an action to enforce the alleged liability of defendants for the wrongful issuance of certain negotiable paper in the name of plaintiff. Affirmed as to some, and reversed as to the other, defendants.

Statement by Vann, J.:

Aside from certain facts alleged by way of inducement, the substantial allegations of the complaint are that from the 8th of November, 1882, until in August, 1884, the defendant, Kneeland, was a stockholder, director and the president of the plaintiff, a railroad corporation, organized under the laws of this State, that as president he was not called upon to perform any duties connected with the active management or operation of the road, and there was no salary attached to his office by any resolution or action either of the stockholders or directors; that his predecessors in office had never received any salary, and that the plaintiff never agreed to pay him a salary as its president, or to pay him for his services; that on the 5th of June, 1884, all of the defendants were directors of the plaintiff, and, with the exception of Mr. Gillett, attended a directors' meeting at which the following resolution was unanimously adopted, viz.:

"Resolved, That S. H. Kneeland, the president of this Company, shall be paid a salary of $25,000 per annum from the time of his election as such," that on the 18th of the same month at another meeting of the directors, all of the defendants being present except Doggin and Haysback, it was unanimously resolved "that the president be and he is authorized to use the credit of the Company by issuing and negotiating its notes, or otherwise, for paying the salary of the said president, said notes to be signed by the president and countersigned by the treasurer in the usual way and form and not to exceed the limit of the amount heretofore authorized;" that prior to the adoption of the latter resolution, as well as subsequently, notes officially signed and countersigned by the president and treasurer, respectively, were issued to the amount, in the aggregate, of $48,950, and are now due and unpaid, that said notes were retained by said Kneeland and applied to his own use, and while some of them are held by certain of the defendants, others were negotiated before maturity and passed into the hands of bona fide purchasers for value without notice, that payment of some of said notes has been demanded of the plaintiff and suits threatened thereon and actions have actually been brought against it upon two thereof; that said Kneeland was never entitled to demand or receive from the plaintiff any salary or compensation for services as such president, and that the Company was under no liability to him either for salary or compensation, as the defendants knew or were bound to know as directors, and that their action in voting to pay him a salary, and in directing the issue of notes for that purpose, was illegal, a breach of trust and a violation of their duty as directors; that said notes are invalid in the hands of all persons except bona fide purchasers, without notice, before maturity and for a valuable and sufficient consideration; that the aforesaid action of the defendants was a fraud upon the plaintiff, and that, in consequence thereof, it has incurred a liability to pay such of said notes as have come into the hands of bona fide purchasers, without notice, for a good consideration and before maturity; that some of said notes were "paid over by the said Kneeland to some of the defendants in payment of or to secure the payment" of precedent indebtedness of said Kneeland to such defendants and that they are still under the control "of the defendants or some of them," and have not passed into the hands of bona fide purchasers.

The relief demanded is that "an account be Notes issued for the purpose of being used and circulated as money, in violation of the statute, are void and cannot be made the basis of recovery (*Atty-Gen. v. Life & F. Ins. Co. 9 Paige, 470, 4 N. A corporation, without any express power in its charter for that purpose, may make a negotiable promissory note or bill of exchange, when not prohibited by law from doing so, provided such note or bill is given for a debt contracted in the course

There is also a prayer for general relief.

The defendants demurred to the complaint, Slayback, Duggin and Kneeland, separately, upon the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; that two causes of action are improperly united, and that there is a defect of parties, both plaintiff and defendant.

Upon the trial an interlocutory judgment was entered sustaining the demurrer as to all of the defendants, with leave to amend in twenty days, but directing that the complaint should be dismissed unless the plaintiff should amend the same during said period. Upon the expiration of twenty days, the plaintiff having omitted to amend, final judgment was entered dismissing the complaint with costs.

Messrs. Davies & Rapallo, for appellant:

The defendants, as agents of the corporation, and trustees of the funds of the stockholders, committed a constructively fraudulent act in appropriating trust property to the use of one of their number without consideration. Their action constituted a tort, and rendered them liable to the corporation and stockholders for all resulting damage.

Messrs. Barlow & Wetmore, for the other respondents:

Where a covenant is to indemnify against "damages" it is not enough that the indemnitee has "incurred damages," but he must have sustained them, by payment.

In the case at bar, the directors have made no express covenant, and if one is implied, it certainly can be no broader than that no "damages" shall come from their acts or omissions.

The person injured by a tortious act can only recover for the damages which he has suffered.

It is legally impossible to determine, in this action, that one single one of these notes is owned by a bona fide holder without notice, since none of such holders are parties to the suit.

The holders would not be bound by the judgment in this action (not being parties), and so the plaintiffs would not be bound.

Meltzer v. Doll, 91 N. Y. 373.

It cannot be successfully claimed that an allegation that an agent, corporate or otherwise, made (or authorized) a note in the name of his principal without authority or consideration, or fraudulently, shows a conversion of the note.

In trover the plaintiff must show a right of property, either absolute or special, in himself—that is, that he is the owner of the property converted.

Vann, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action against the directors of a corporation for fraudulently issuing and negotiating promissory notes in its name, which, on reaching the hands of bona fide purchasers for value, became legal obligations against the Company. The substantial question presented by the demurrer is whether such an action can be maintained upon an allegation of liability to pay without an allegation either of payment or of actual loss. In an action for the conversion of a promissory note by wrongfully negotiating it to a bona fide holder for value, the maker need neither allege nor prove that he has paid it, but it is sufficient if he avers that he is legally liable to pay it. Decker v. Mathews, 12 N. Y. 313.

The gravamen of such an action, as was held in the case cited, is the wrongful act of the defendant in causing a note without value, except to a bona fide holder, to become valuable by the sale thereof to such a purchaser as could enforce it against the plaintiff. It was also held in that case that a cause of action accrued to the maker as soon as he became liable upon the note through the transfer thereof, and that neither the right of action nor the measure of damages depended upon the fact of payment.

This case was relied upon by the court when it rendered judgment in Farnham v. Benedict, 107 N. Y. 189, 9 Cent. Rep. 557, where the defendant, being in possession, without title, of certain town bonds that had been fraudulently issued through his procurement, and which were void in fact, although apparently valid, sold them to bona fide purchasers and thus rendered them valid and binding upon the town so that it was compelled to pay them. It was held that he was liable to the town for the amount of the bonds, and Judge Rapallo speaking for the court said that immediately on the negotiation of the bonds a cause of action accrued in favor of the town, either in the nature of an action of trover for the face of the bonds, or as for money had and received, for the money realized by him on the sale, according to the rule laid down in Comstock v. Hior, 78 N. Y. 269.

In Thayer v. Manley, 78 N. Y. 805, the defendant by means of false and fraudulent representations induced the plaintiff to execute and deliver to him three negotiable promissory notes, but before any of them became due the plaintiff demanded them from the defendant, who refused to deliver them. He still held the notes at the time of the trial, but one of them had become due after the commencement of the action. It was held that, as the defendant had it in his power, when the suit was commenced, to dispose of the notes to a bona fide holder in whose hands they would have been valid, and as the plaintiff was then entitled to recover the damage which might accrue to him, this right was not impaired by the subsequent maturity of one of the notes before a transfer; that as the judgment and a satisfaction thereof would transfer title to the notes to defendant, plaintiff was entitled to recover the full value, but that to avoid circuity of action a provision should be incorporated in the judgment giving to defendant the right to cancel and return the notes as a satisfaction of the damages. It was also held that the measure of damages in such an action is the face of the note and interest, unless it should appear that it was of less value by reason of payment of the same, insolvency of the maker or some other lawful defense.

In Boss v. Daily, 8 N. Y. S. R. 300, it was held that in an action by a partner against his copartner and certain third persons for fraudulently making notes in the name of the firm and negotiating them so that bona fide holders could compel the plaintiff to pay them, the cause of action was complete when the wrong was done and that payment of the notes was not essential to a recovery. Some of the notes were paid by the plaintiff after the commencement of the action, and before trial, but a verdict for the amount of all the notes fraudulently negotiated was sustained. The court said: "The plaintiff was not injured to the amount of money which he had paid out in taking up these fraudulent notes at the time of beginning the action. The injury to him was done when the notes were first negotiated."

In Ontario v. Hill, 88 Hun, 280, the defendants were held liable for wrongfully issuing the negotiable bonds of a town, some of which had fallen into the hands of innocent holders for value. It was determined that the cause of action accrued immediately upon the passing of the bonds into the hands of bona fide purchasers who could enforce them against the town. "In a legal sense," it was said, "the plaintiff had sustained damages by the action of the defendants when the bonds passed into the hands of persons who could enforce their payment against the town. The plaintiffs' alleged right of action springs out of the defendants' breach of duty as public officers, and is in the nature of an action on the case for consequential damages."

This case was subsequently reversed, but not on this point. Ontario v. Hill, 96 N. Y. 324.

While the case presented by this appeal may not be a strict action of conversion, it bears a close analogy to actions of that character when brought by the makers of negotiable promissory notes for the conversion thereof. What is the nature of the injury for which such an action lies? It is not the loss of the material substance of the note, which is simply a piece of paper with a few words written thereon. Neither is it the loss of a contract, or of the evidence of a contract, that the maker could enforce, because it is his own engagement in form, but not even that in fact. The wrongful destruction of an article is ordinarily a conversion thereof, but the destruction of a note that had had no inception would not be a conversion as to the maker, unless it might be deemed a conversion of the material substance only, which is not now important. The injury consists in the negotiation of the note, so that, according to the law-merchant, it becomes a valid and enforceable contract against the maker, or, as in Thayer v. Manley, supra, in retaining possession after demand made, so that the wrong-doer had the power to put it into lawful circulation. Wrongfully aiding in the negotiation of a note, or wrongfully making a note to be negotiated by others, would appear to be injuries of the same character.

What was the nature of the tortious act of which the defendants by their demurrer admit they were guilty? Those who voted for the resolution which in form authorized one of their number to issue and negotiate notes of the plaintiff, assumed to authorize and, by authorizing, caused some of the notes in question to be issued and negotiated. They had no power, express or implied, to pass that resolution, or its predecessor which provided a salary for the president. They could not thus give away the property of the corporation. They could not bind the stockholders by voting to appropriate the assets of the Company to an illegal purpose. Butts v. Wood, 87 N. Y. 817; Coleman v. Second Ave. R. Co. 38 N. Y. 201; Opden v. Murray, 30 N. Y. 203; Kelley v. Sargent, 40 Hun, 150; Mauz Ferry Grand Road Co. v. Brangpen, 40 Ind. 351; Holder v. Lafayette, B. & M. R. Co. 71 Ill. 106; Accommodation Loan & S. F. Assn. v. Stonemets, 20 Pa. 534; Kilpatrick v. Penness Ferry Bridge Co. 49 Pa. 118.

Their action, as admitted on the record, was a violation of their duty as directors, a breach of trust and a fraud upon the plaintiff. The result of their action was to cause notes to be made, purporting to be valid obligations of the plaintiff, although in fact void. While not the notes of the Company they appeared to be such, as they were issued by those having apparent authority. If nothing further had been done, however, the wrong would doubtless have been injuria adque damno, but the defendants who adopted the second resolution thereby authorized the negotiation of the notes and some of them were negotiated accordingly and reached the hands of bona fide holders for value. These notes, as is here admitted, the plaintiff has become liable to pay in consequence of the fraudulent conduct of those defendants. Thus the dead pieces of paper were, to this extent, given life and converted into contracts binding upon the Company without its consent. In what respect do these wrongful acts differ from those which, in the cases cited, were held to authorize an action for conversion, or an action in the nature of conversion? Do they differ in the character of the injury inflicted, or loss sustained? Is there not in each the same presumption of damages springing from a liability wrongfully imposed? Were not all of these actions founded upon the fact that the maker, real or apparent, of a negotiable instrument, had, through the wrongful acts of another, become chargeable, so that he could be compelled to pay such instrument, which would not have ripened into a valid obligation against him but for such wrongful act?

We think that the cases relating to this subject rest upon the principle that a person who fraudulently places in circulation the negotiable instrument of another, whether made by him or by his apparent authority, and thereby renders him liable to pay the same to a bona fide purchaser, is guilty of a tort, and, in the absence of special circumstances diminishing its value, is presumptively liable to the injured party for the face value thereof. As the case under consideration fairly comes within this principle, it should be governed by it. The essential injury common to all cases of this character is the fraudulent imposition of liability. Hence there should be a common remedy, whether it is called an action in conversion or in the nature of conversion, or a special action on the case.

These views lead to a reversal of the judgment as to all of the defendants who voted for the resolution authorizing the president of the Company to issue and negotiate its notes for the purpose of paying him a salary to which he was not entitled. The defendants Slayback and Duggin, who demur separately, but through the same attorneys and upon the same grounds as the other defendants, except Kneeland, did not vote for said resolution, although they voted for the resolution to pay the president a salary. This act, although wrongful, was harmless, so far as appears, until supplemented by further action in which they did not participate, and for which, upon the record as presented, they cannot be held responsible. The passage of the resolution for the payment of a salary, without specifying how it should be paid, did not bring the notes into existence nor put them into circulation. No cause of action was set forth, therefore, as to those defendants, who are not alleged to have had any connection with the act that resulted in making and negotiating the notes.

The judgment should be affirmed as to the defendants Slayback and Duggin, but, under the circumstances, without costs.

As to all the other defendants, the judgment should be reversed, and the demurrer overruled, with costs, with leave to such defendants to withdraw their demurrer and serve an answer within thirty days upon payment of costs.

All concur, except Potter, J., not sitting.

(...N. Y....)

1. An executed parol agreement modifying a contract under seal will be upheld.
2. A gift may be made of the balance of a debt after payment of part only, although payment of such part cannot constitute an accord and satisfaction. A receipt in full may be evidence of the gift.

(April 20, 1880.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, First Department, overruling exceptions directed to be heard at General Term in the first instance, and ordering judgment to be entered upon the verdict directed by the Trial Term in favor of plaintiffs in an action to recover rent alleged to be due and unpaid. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion, Mr. W. B. Horie, with Messrs. Oudlipp & Glover, for appellants:

The agreements were after breach (i. e., after each quarterly payment became due) and were fully executed.

The situation of the parties was in effect the same as if defendants had on each quarter day paid the full amount specified in the lease, and the plaintiffs had then given to defendants the sum of $250; and the arrangement, having become executed, is not now subject to attack.

See 2 Parsons, Cont. 3d ed. p. 518; Nicoll v. Burke, 78 N. Y. 580.

A sealed agreement may be modified by an executed parol agreement.

The plaintiffs made a gift to the defendants of $250 upon each quarterly payment, and cannot now recover back such gifts.

The rule that payment of a portion of a debt cannot be pleaded as an accord and satisfaction to the claim for a larger sum, has met with more or less dissatisfaction in the recent cases, and by the simplest device the application of the rule may be evaded or prevented. And it is submitted that at this day in this tribunal administering justice upon equitable as well as legal principles, not sacrificing substance to form, it should not be held that the absence or omission of such a device shall render a transaction illegal or invalid that with such a device would be upheld.

Mrs. Lewis Johnston and Edward W. S. Johnston, for respondents:

The plaintiffs' claim cannot be defeated except by proof of a valid agreement to reduce the rent, and a surrender of the written lease. There was no offer to show any consideration for the alleged parol agreement to reduce, and the parties returned, by defendants' own showing, to the terms of the original written lease.

The lease was not valid by the Statute of Frauds unless in writing, and it cannot be varied by parol without a violation of the Statute.

Hill v. Blake, 97 N. Y. 222.

Haught, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to recover the amount of rent alleged to be due and unpaid upon a lease of real estate in the City of New York. It appears that the parties had made and executed a lease under seal whereby the plaintiffs leased to the defendants the store and premises known as No. 16 Fourth Street for the term of ten years from May 1, 1877, for the annual rental of $4,500, payable quarterly. Upon the trial the defendants offered to prove in substance that after they had occupied the premises for one year under the lease, and paid the rent in full for that year, they reported to the plaintiffs that their business was very dull and that they could not afford to pay so much rent. That thereupon the plaintiffs agreed to reduce the rent $1,000 per year, making it $3,500 a year, or $875 for each quarter. That thereafter the defendants at the end of each quarter paid the plaintiffs $875, and the plaintiffs executed and delivered to them a receipt for that amount in full for balance of rent due at that date as per agreement "until times are better." That this continued for three years, after which the plaintiffs notified the defendants that thereafter they wished them to pay the amount of rent originally provided for by the lease, and that thereafter the full amount of rent was paid until the commencement of this action in December, 1886. This evidence was excluded by the trial court and a verdict ordered for the plaintiffs for the full amount claimed.

The general term was of the opinion that the case of Coe v. Hobby, 7 Hun, 137, 79 N. Y. 141, disposed of the questions involved in this case. The facts in that case are very similar to those which were offered to be proved in this, but in that case the action was brought for a quarter's rent which had become due, no part of which had been paid, the lessor refusing to any longer accept the reduced amount agreed upon; and he did not seek or claim the right to recover the balance of the quarterly rents which had previously been paid in part under the agreement and for which a receipt had been given in full. The distinction, therefore, between the two cases is apparent. In that case the lessor was seeking to enforce the provisions of his lease, which was under seal, and collect a quarter's rent then due and owing. The lessees were defending under an executory verbal contract to reduce the rent. Whilst in this case the lessees are defending under an executed oral agreement to the effect that the rent has been paid and accepted in full, and is evidenced by a written receipt given therefor.

We shall not question the rule that a contract or covenant under seal cannot be modified by a parol unexecuted contract. Coe v. Hobby, supra; Smith v. Kerr, 33 Hun, 567-571, 108 N. Y. 81, 10 Cent. Rep. 842.

Neither shall we question the views of the court below to the effect that the alleged oral agreement in this case to reduce the rent $1,000 per year was void and inoperative in so far as it remained unexecuted. The lessors had the right to repudiate it at any time and demand the full amount of rent provided for by the lease; but in so far as the oral agreement had become executed, as to the payments which had fallen due and had been paid and accepted in full as per the oral agreement, we think the rule invoked has no application.

The reason of the rule was founded upon public policy. It was not regarded as safe or prudent to permit the contract of parties which had been carefully reduced to writing and executed under seal to be modified or changed by the testimony of witnesses as to the parol statements or agreements of parties. Hence the rule that testimony of parol agreements shall not be competent as evidence to impeach, vary or modify written agreements or covenants under seal. But the parties may waive this rule and carry out and perform the agreements under seal as changed or modified by the parol agreement, thus executing both agreements; and where this has been done and the parties have settled with a full knowledge of the facts and in the absence of fraud, there is no power to revoke or remedy reserved to either party. Murray v. Perkins, 9 Pick. 298; Lattimore v. Harren, 14 Johns. 380, McCravy v. Day, 6 L. R. A. 503, 119 N. Y. 1.

So in this case, if, as is claimed, the parol agreement was made to reduce the rent $1,000 per year, and that agreement has been carried out and fully executed by the parties, and at the end of each quarter, when the rent by the terms of the lease became due and payable, the reduced sum as agreed upon by the parol agreement was paid, and the parties settled upon that basis, and, as evidence of such settlement, the plaintiff gave a receipt in full for the amount of rent due to that date, it became executed and the plaintiff cannot revoke the same or maintain this action to recover any greater sum than that settled for.

It is also claimed that the oral agreement was void for the want of a consideration. Assume this to be so, and that the plaintiffs at any time whilst the agreement remained executory had the right to demand the full amount of rent provided for by the lease. They, however, had the right to waive consideration and carry out their parol agreement, and if they did this, executing it, they were brought within the rule to which we have already called attention.

To illustrate: A may give B his promissory note without consideration. As long as it remains in the hands of B, A may interpose the defense that it was given for B's accommodation and was without consideration. But as soon as A executed his promise to B by paying the note his agreement becomes executed and he cannot recover back the money so paid.

It may be claimed that the payment of a less sum than the admitted debt is not a good accord and satisfaction. There are numerous authorities sustaining this doctrine. Lord Coke stated the rule to be that where the condition is for the payment of a definite, fixed, liquidated sum, the obligor cannot, at the time appointed, pay a less sum in satisfaction of the whole, because it is apparent that the lesser sum of money cannot be a satisfaction of a greater.

This rule has been criticized as unsound and unjust in cases where the lesser sum is accepted in full satisfaction of the greater. See Coke, Litt. 212 B; Feakes v. Barr, L. R. 9 App. Cas. 605, 614, 617; Jaffray v. Davis, 48 Hun, 500.

Whilst in other cases the courts have, still further and held that the rule applied even in cases where the payment was accepted in full satisfaction and a receipt given therefor. Herriman v. Herriman, 19 Gray, 541; Smith v. Phillips, 77 Va. 545; Bunge v. Keop, 48 N. Y. 235; Wilkinson v. Byers, 1 Ad. & El. 106; Langdell, Sel. Cas. Cont. 197, 201.

Under the view taken by us of this case, it does not become necessary to approve or disapprove of the doctrine promulgated in these cases, for this rule has no application when the payment is made under an agreement which is recognized as valid by the parties, and has been fully executed.

Again, a debt could be discharged at common law by executing a formal release under seal. The seal imported a consideration, and this has not been questioned by any of the cases.

There undoubtedly is a distinction between releases under seal and an ordinary receipt given on the payment of a sum of money which is not under seal, the latter being subject to explanation and proof showing that it was given without consideration.

But even though there may not be an accord and satisfaction, there may be a gift, and the receipt may be evidence of such gift. A gift is a voluntary transfer of any property or thing by one to another without consideration. To be valid it must be executed. There must be a delivery by the donor, such as will place the property or thing given under the control of the donee, and there must be an intent to vest the title in him. Actual and personal delivery by the donor is not always necessary, for when another person is the custodian an order of the donor to deliver to the donee may constitute a gift. It may be oral or in writing. No formal words or expressions are required. It is a question of intent, and the inquiry is as to what was intended by that which was said and done. A promissory note or other evidence of debt may be the subject of a gift, and the delivery of the note or of the evidence of debt is evidence tending to show an intent to give. A debt may be forgiven, and a receipt in full may be evidence of such forgiveness. 2 Schouler, Pers. Prop. 63-66. See also Bishop, Cont. § 50.

In the case of Gray v. Barton, 58 N. Y. 68, the defendant was owing the plaintiff the sum of $820. The plaintiff told him that if he would give him $1 to make it lawful he would give him the entire debt. Whereupon the defendant delivered $1 to the plaintiff, who thereupon executed and delivered a receipt therefor in full to balance all accounts to date of whatever name and nature. It was held that the executing and delivery of the receipt in full, with the purpose of giving the debt, was such an act that the law would construe the instrument, if necessary, as an assignment to the defendant.

This case is in point and is controlling upon the question under consideration. See Ferry v. Stephens, 66 N. Y. 331; Carpenter v. Boula, 68 N. Y. 251-256.

We are therefore of the opinion that the proof offered should have been received, that from it the jury might have found that the plaintiffs gave to the defendant the balance of the rent for which this action was brought.

The judgment should be reversed and a new trial ordered, with costs to abide the event.

All concur except Pollett, Ch. J., Bradley and Parker, JJ., who dissent.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA, Appt.,
v.
RAVES.

(N. C.)

1. The removal of a certain church will not affect the portion of a statute prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquor within three miles of such church, where the statute does not show that its object was to protect the church alone.

2. An arrest of judgment can be granted only for a defect appearing upon the face of the record.

On motion therefor, knowledge derived from the evidence cannot be considered.

(April 21, 1888.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the Superior Court for Rutherford County arresting judgment upon a verdict convicting defendant of illegal liquor selling. Reversed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion Messrs. Theodore F. Davidson, Atty-Gen., and R. H. Battle for appellant.

Mr. J. M. Holding for appellee.

Clark, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Chapter 284, Acts 1881, prohibited the sale of spirituous liquor at numerous points named, and, among others, "within three miles of Rutherfordton Baptist Church, in Rutherford County." The defendant was indicted for selling spirituous liquor "within three miles of the old site of the Rutherfordton Baptist Church, in Rutherford County, contrary to the Statute in such case made and provided," and was found guilty. He moved in arrest of judgment, which was allowed, as stated by the court, upon the grounds: "(1) that the indictment was defective in not setting forth the fact that at the time of the ratification of the Statute there was such a church in Rutherford County as the 'Rutherfordton Baptist Church, and that it had since been moved,' (2) that the law had been passed to protect the church, and, as the church had been removed and no longer needed protection at the old site, the law ceased to be operative; the reason ceasing, the law ceased also."

The principle quoted, that, "the reason ceasing, the law ceases also," has reference solely to the application of settled legal principles to a given state of facts, a system which is usually called the "common law." It has no application to the supposed legislative reason for adopting a statute which must speak for itself, and is construed according to its tenor. There are rules for the construction of statutes where their meaning is doubtful, such as considering the mischief to be remedied, or the object to be attained.

Potter's Dwar. Stat. 188, citing Story, Const. Laws, p. 10, and Dow v. Reid, 45 U. S. 10 Pet. 594 [9 L. ed. 519], says: "Although the spirit of an instrument is to be regarded no less than its letter, yet the spirit is to be collected from the letter."

The rules for construing the meaning of doubtful language in a statute, by the intention of the Legislature, do not authorize the courts to infer the motive of that body in passing an Act, and when a state of facts which then existed ceases, the courts have no power to hold that such state of facts caused the Act to be passed, and therefore the Act itself is at an end. Here there are no doubtful words to construe. The meaning and intention are clearly to forbid the sale of spirituous liquor within three miles of the point named. There is no intent indicated that the law should cease to operate if the state of facts then existing should change. The rule is, if the language is doubtful and the intention clear, to construe the language by the intention. Here, the language being clear, the supposed policy of the Legislature is too uncertain a ground upon which to found the interpretation of the Statute. Brown v. Brown, 108 N. C. 212.

If the object was solely to protect the church in the quiet exercise of religious services, and not the people of the adjacent territory as well, it is strange that the Act was to be in force all the time, and is not limited to the days such services are held, as is the case with the Act prohibiting the sale or giving away of intoxicating liquor within five miles of a polling place (Code, § 2740); or the Act prohibiting the same within two miles of a political speaking (Id. § 1079); or the General Act prohibiting it, except by licensed dealers, within one mile of any place where religious exercises are in progress. Id. § 2671.

It may be that the motive with the Legislature was to protect the church. The Statute does not so declare. If such was the motive, and the occasion of it has ceased, another Legislature may see fit to repeal the law. The court cannot do so. If the church had been burned, an accident or an incendiary could not destroy an Act of the Legislature, nor could the removal of the church by vote of a majority of its members nullify the law. The church is merely designated as the locality from which the distance of three miles is to be measured. Its removal can no more repeal the Statute than the destruction of a beginning corner can vitiate a deed. The removal to a new site cannot make it the center of a new district of three miles, but the distance must still be measured from the spot where the church stood when the Act was passed. In Spain, where windmills are common, they have a saying: "Though the mills are down, the winds are blowing there still." Though the church has been removed, people are still living within the three-mile radius of where it stood, and they cannot be deprived of the protection of the Statute upon the assumption that the Legislature meant to protect churches only. Indeed, in this same Act, territory within a given distance of certain mills, mines, factories and railroad stations, and also certain entire townships, are protected. Could the act of a private citizen in closing his mine or removing his mill or factory, or the act of a railroad corporation in changing its depot, or of the county commissioners in the division or absorption of a township, repeal the application of the Statute to the territory described in the Act? With as much force it might be argued that a change of name would have that effect. If the continuing force of a statute depends upon the conduct of individuals, the congregation would take the adjacent territory out of the Statute as certainly by a change of the name of their church as by a removal of the building, possibly, a few yards or more. In both cases the test is, What spot was designated by the Legislature as the point from which the territory exempted is to be measured? and no one except the Legislature can change or repeal the Statute. State v. Moody, 95 N. C. 656; State v. Patterson, 98 N. C. 666.

The case of State v. Hampton, 77 N. C. 596, is not in point; for there the Act prohibited the sale of intoxicating liquor within three miles of Asheville & Spartanburg Railroad during the construction of said road, and the Act was held to be in force only during the time limited. There is no such limitation here. Had the Act prohibited the sale of liquor within three miles of the church during divine services, whenever no services were held there, whether the omission was caused by a removal of the building or otherwise, the Act would not be in operation. Aliter, when, as here, the church or the mill or railroad station is only a designation of the central point of the protected territory.

Another objection applies to both of the grounds assigned in arrest of judgment. An arrest of judgment can only be granted for a defect appearing upon the face of the record. Nothing which appears thereon shows that the church had in fact been removed at all, or stands elsewhere than it did the day the Act was ratified. It is true the bill charges "the old site of Rutherfordton Baptist Church." Non constat, but that the church named in the Act was built upon such old site. It may or may not be so. It is a matter of surmise, and not a "defect apparent." Probably it would have been better if the additional allegation suggested by the court below had been made in the indictment, but advantage of any supposed defect in that regard could only be taken before verdict. It is cured by verdict, for, apart from the knowledge derived from the evidence, which cannot be considered on a motion in arrest of judgment, there is nothing to show that the words "old site" are anything other than mere surplusage. If, however, those words can be taken as showing a removal of the church since the Statute, there is no defect; for the old site is the proper point from which the three miles are to be measured. The judgment in arrest must be set aside, and the cause remanded, that the superior court may proceed to pass judgment upon the verdict in conformity to this opinion.

VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

Alice Lee DAVIS et al., Appts.,
v.

Thomas V. STRANGE'S EXECUTOR.

(...Va....)

A reconveyance by a natural daughter to her father will be set aside where he had deliberately conveyed her the property as a gift, and after becoming feeble in body and mind was, although unwilling, driven by other members of his family to ask her for a reconveyance, and she gave it without time for reflection, consultation or advice while deeply moved by his distress, and urged by the family lawyer, who had been sent with him and who told her that it would be best for her to do so, although he knew the fact, unknown to her, that her father's latest will had omitted all provisions for her which former wills contained.

(April 10, 1890.)

APPEAL by complainants from a decree of the Circuit Court for the City of Lynchburg dismissing their bill in a suit brought to set aside a deed of certain real estate which was alleged to have been procured through undue influence. Reversed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Kirkpatrick & Blackford for appellants.

Mr. R. G. H. Kean for appellee.

Fauntleroy, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The petition of Alice Lee Davis and Joseph

NOTE.—Undue influence.

To constitute undue influence the testator must be so controlled by persuasion, pressure or fraudulent contrivance that he is not left to act intelligently and voluntarily, but becomes subject to the will or purposes of others. Re Mitchell's Estate (Minn.) Feb. 27, 1890.

Undue influence must destroy free agency and amount to moral or physical coercion. Elkinton v. Brick, 18 Cent. Rep. 388, 44 N. J. Eq. 184.

Importunity, which cannot be and is not resisted, is undue influence. The mere suggestion to a testator that an indicated testamentary provision would be productive of justice between the natural objects of his bounty can hardly amount to undue influence. Ibid.

It is impossible to distinguish by rule between that which is within the bounds of legitimate influence and that which makes the influence undue. The effect of all acts must depend upon the relations between the parties to them, and the character, strength and condition of each, and be determined by the application of sound sense to each given case. Ibid.

When two parties occupy to each other a confidential relation, and a sale is made by the party reposing confidence to the party in whom confidence is reposed, equity raises a presumption against the validity of the transaction. Dunn v. Dunn, 6 Cent. Rep. 91, 42 N. J. Eq. 481.

Undue influence exists wherever, through weakness, ignorance, dependence or implicit reliance of one on the good faith of another, the latter obtains an ascendancy which prevents the former from exercising an unbiased judgment. To affect a will it must, in a measure at least, destroy free agency and operate on the mind of the testator at the time of making the will. Horster v. Horster, 183 Pa. 280.

Where there is a suspicion of undue influence, raised by general circumstances, in a suit to set aside a deed of a gift made to one in loco parentis, the burden is on the grantee to show grantor's knowledge and the fairness of the transaction. Worrall's App. 1 Cent. Rep. 201, 110 Pa. 849. See Cowee v. Cornell, 75 N. Y. 92.

In determining the question of undue influence, the mental and physical condition of the testator and the provisions of the will itself are proper matters of consideration. Myers v. Hauger, 98 Mo. 438.

Where a son enjoyed the confidence of his aged mother, and exercised great influence over her, and confidential relations existed between them, the burden of proof is on such son to show, aside from the formal way by which a gift passed to his credit, that it was in fact a gift. Parker v. Parker, 4 Cent. Rep. 87, 45 N. J. Eq. 224.

Undue influence as to a gift inter vivos may be shown by evidence of influence by the donee in other matters; as, in the relations of physician, advisor, friend and agent. Woodbury v. Woodbury, 2 New Eng. Rep. 90, 141 Mass. 320.

The burden of showing that a will was induced by undue influence is upon the party who alleges the fact. Tyler v. Gardiner, 36 N. Y. 594.

As to wills.

The undue influence to be available to set aside a will must be such as to overpower and subject the will of the testator, thus producing a disposition of property which he would not have made if left freely to act his own pleasure. Re Eiler's Will, 29 N. Y. S. R. 58.

It is not necessary to invalidate a will on the ground of undue influence, that the improper influence should have been resorted to at the time of the execution of the will; but it is sufficient if the

B. Davis, her husband, represents that they are aggrieved by a decree of the Circuit Court of the City of Lynchburg, entered on the 2d day of January, 1889, by which it was adjudged and decreed that the bill of the complainants be dismissed; and that the complainant, Alice Lee Davis, formerly Alice Lee Strange, pay to the defendants their costs, etc.

The bill was filed by appellant Alice Lee Strange to vacate and annul and to set aside a deed, executed by her August 26, 1887, by which she conveyed to Thomas V. Strange a house and lot in the City of Lynchburg, Va., of the value of $8,000 or $10,000, without consideration, in a situation of sudden surprise and emergency of action, without the presence or advice of friend or counsel, and when she was rendered wholly unable to exercise a consenting mind, by the undue influence of her father and of his attorney and agent, who pressed her with importunity and strong persuasions, and assurances that she would be otherwise provided for and compensated, that she should not lose anything by it, and that it would be best for her to make the property back to Mr. Strange, as it was threatened to be burned; under the compulsion of which, she hastily and inconsiderately executed the deed, to which she had been already most powerfully moved and induced by the distress and suffering, expressed and exhibited to her, of her aged and devoted father, occasioned to him by the reproaches and importunate remonstrances and interference of his son-in-law and other daughter.

The facts of the case, as disclosed in the record, show the environments of the appellant, and the actual, relative and correlative circumstances in which she was placed, and under which she was improperly induced to the hasty, inconsiderate and unconscionable transaction which she prays to be relieved from by the equitable jurisdiction of this court, reviewing the denial of her prayer and the dismissal of her bill by the circuit court.

Alice Lee Strange, who, since this suit was instituted, has intermarried with Joseph B. Davis, is the natural daughter of the late Thomas V. Strange, of Lynchburg, a white man, by a colored woman named "Belle." She was received into the family of her father as his child, and treated, both by his wife and himself, as the petted daughter of the household, with equal rights and recognition with his legitimate child. Every advantage of education was afforded her; and, when old enough to leave the paternal roof, she was sent to a boarding-school in Washington City, where she remained until she graduated. It is the fact—the status—of this relation of parent and child, and the family recognition and association which obtained between the appellant and her father and his household, which it is important to state and remark, however revolting to the moral sense and offensive against public policy. The relations which existed between her and her father and his wife and the whole family are indicated by a number of letters from her father to her, written during her absence in Washington, which are filed as exhibits with the bill. They show the deepest parental affection and the most anxious and tender solicitude and guardian care over her and for her as his favorite child; and his liberal intentions toward her in regard to his estate, and that he freely conferred with her in regard to his intentions. They not only show her environments and motives, which, through her filial feelings, overmastered her will in the rash and immoderate act into which she was precipitated, and from which she now seeks relief; but they reveal the hidden though powerful influences and agencies which instigated and controlled a transaction in which her father was as unwilling and as much wronged a victim as was the daughter herself.

will was afterwards executed under a controlling influence previously put in operation, and which was still controlling the testator to the extent of destroying his free agency. Overall v. Hland, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 371.

Late decisions in reference to death.

A deed of land from a woman seventy-seven years of age, of sound mind, but worried and nervous about the matter in question, will be set aside upon a showing that she was unduly influenced, that she was in confidential relation with the grantee, and signed the deed thinking that it was a power of attorney, and that she did not intend to part with the title to the land. June v. Willis, 34 Blatchf. 189, 20 Fed. Rep. 11.

A deed by an aged, feeble and ignorant man cannot be sustained, where the consideration is the future care from a daughter, which arrangement is not embodied in the deed, which the grantor's inability to read made the more necessary; and where there were no terms agreed upon, and the son-in-law accounted to the grantor for the proceeds of a farm conveyed, for a year or more after the deed. McDaniel v. McCoy, 15 West. Rep. 664, 68 Mich. 383.

A conveyance of a farm worth $2,500, by a man seventy-seven years old, and weak in body and mind, to his son-in-law, in consideration of a promise, afterward fulfilled, on the part of the latter, to take care of the grantor as long as he lived and to bury him, will not, in the absence of positive proof of fraud or duress, upon grantor's death within a year after conveyance, be set aside at the instance of his heirs. Travis v. Lowry (Pa.) 1 Cent. Rep. 333.

A deed obtained by children from an aged and infirm parent of failing mind, of property worth $6,000, for a consideration of $10, on a mere vague promise to take care of the grantor, by representing to him that other children are about to place him under guardianship and seize his property, will be set aside as having been obtained by fraud and undue influence, although the other children do subsequently obtain an inquest and have the grantor adjudged of unsound mind, as they had previously proposed to the grantor as the proper course, but not for the purpose of obtaining control of his property. Giles v. Hodges, 74 Wis. 303.

Transactions based on breach of trust, not enforceable.

A person cannot retain the advantage of a transaction which he has promoted through a breach of confidence reposed in him by a party to the transaction, even though the transaction could not have been impeached had no confidential relations existed. Tate v. Williamson, L. R. 3 Ch. 55; Shoben v. Bate, L. R. 1 Ch. 302; Hillage v. Southon, 9 Harv. 534.

We cannot extend these letters, in this opinion, as they appear in the record, in their full length and significance; but a few extracts from some of them will illustrate our commentary.

On the 18th of November, 1878, he writes:

"My Dear Alice: Yours to mine of the 11th inst. was read to me last night by Minnie [his wife], so far as she could for sobbing, for she can never read your letters without crying. Please recollect what I have before said to you—that is, to do well for yourself; if you do that, all will be well with you. That means much more, perhaps, than you are aware. It is the great concern of men advanced in life to know what to do with what they have accumulated by industry and economy and prudence, men of my own stamp, for instance, don't leave their effects to fools and spendthrifts."

On the 12th of December, 1878, he writes:

"Dear Alice: Your postal card to Nannie [his daughter, Mrs. Litchford] to hand at the store [of Strange & Litchford]. You know that I have before asked you not to write on p. c. to us. It is a fact, that we have kept secret from you, that you are hated by one in the family with unequalled hatred, and simply because Minnie and myself love and provide for you, and so intend to do. It was because of that that Nannie [Mrs. Litchford] went to the Springs last summer, at a cost of $150, to prevent her from staying in the house with negroes. When you visit Lynchburg, you are not to visit them, tho' Nannie and the children will visit you. I hope and pray that your talents will place you head and shoulders ahead of them; whilst I wish them all good luck, both parties are of my family. I care for all, and wish to place all beyond the powers of this world; but you in particular I wish to see stand prominent in the land because of your worth. We don't hear from Belle and Charlie."

On the 31st of July, 1879, he writes:

"Dear Loved One: Your last of 30th inst.

to hand; all three of your letters to hand. Last one causes uneasiness for fear of my letter to you on Monday, 28th, draft for $35, is lost or stolen. . . . Don't think that I will ever forget you. That would be impossible after Minnie and myself having raised you, and the request that I would not forsake you, and still more to stand by and see you complete your studies. Two people were never more devoted to each other than Minnie and myself; and for her sake, if no more, you will not be forgotten or forsaken. Death is one of the uncertain things of the world, and therefore I shall leave in the hands of J. E. Yoder some important papers for you, and with the request, in the event of my death, that you be at once informed of it, that the proper steps may be taken to secure your interest. I have much to say. God bless you."

On the 10th of October, 1879, he writes:

"Dear Child Alice: Some several years since I made a will, which was then my will; but since the death of Minnie [his wife] it is right to make another, which was done yesterday, and is in the hands of J. E. Yoder, who was one of the witnesses of the same, as was also Mr. Work and Mayor Branch, in which you are largely interested. Should I drop off, you will be posted. It is entirely secret, and will so remain until my death. Say nothing of it to anyone, but I have made arrangement for Belle to have $150 per annum, unless she marry; in that event, she has nothing. I mention this to assure you that you will never be forgotten. Not a word from you since the telegram. How is that? God bless you, Belle and Charlie. If you write, and I don't get them, I must get a box to myself."

—Thus showing his apprehension that someone unfriendly to her (meaning his son-in-law and partner) would intercept their correspondence, if his mail continued to come with the general mail of Strange & Litchford.

On the 23d of October, 1879, he writes:

"Yours of the 19th and 20th to hand. Next Monday I will send you amount promised. I want you to keep on with music and drawing, as Minnie requested. Her life was tied up in yours, and if I am to carry out any wish of hers on earth, it is to complete your education, and then to see that you are provided for. Will send the dress as soon as ready. May kind words be with you, and God's blessing rest upon you. If you will start on teaching, you will find that you will rise very fast. If you marry you will be tied down. There is much ahead for you."

On the 20th of November, 1879, he writes:

"Dear Child: Yours of the 16th at hand to-day. Am always glad to hear from you. Am glad your music scholars are on the increase. It afforded me happiness to do or any things to make our angel Minnie happy, and she, as you know, left nothing undone to make me happy or comfortable; and consequently two people never got on better than we did. And from day of our marriage to her sickness our attachment increased for each other, and now soon be five months since her death, and yet I can't realize the fact that she has gone to the spirit land. And if I was the Christian that she was, I would rejoice for the time to come for me to go to meet her. Nannie is all to me that she can be; nothing left undone that can be done for my comfort; yet, after all, if I could be with you and Bella, it seems it would be a paradise to me. I advise you against writing to Nannie, on account of her selfish husband, and his hatred for you, not for any wrong that you have done him, or any other living soul, but because you were loved by Minnie and myself. I expect the day will come when you will soar long above him; and for that end never cease to strive. I enclose X. Will send the other toward the end of the month. May God's blessing rest upon you, dear child, and the other two."

"Lynchburg, April 30th, 1884.

"My Dear Alice: No doubt you think long time my delay in writing. Writing has got to be quite irksome to me, hence one cause of delay; and next to that the pressure upon me. As to my taking up the two notes before they are due, I do not now see how to do it, as we have just got through a $20,000 job, namely the mill. I will take them up, however, as they come due. Our city is making rapid strides of improvement. I expect to be over in June.

"Affectionately, T. V. Strange."

These extracts show that appellant was very dear to her father and his wife; and that his full intent was not only to educate and take care of her while he lived, but to make ample provision for her at his death. With deep parental care for his favorite child, and with solicitude lest she should, by some accident, not be provided for, he made his will in 1879, in which she was provided for, and which he gave to Mr. Yoder for safe keeping. He apprised her of it, and that she was largely interested in it. In the year 1881 he determined to change his scheme of providing for her by will, and placed his bounty to her in grants by deeds, to protect her, no doubt, as far as possible, from the contingencies of his own advancing age, and the machinations of his son-in-law, whose selfish hate he so dreaded, and against whom he, with prophetic wisdom, intended to shield her.

On the 1st of August, 1881, he purchased and conveyed to her a dwelling-house in Washington City, costing $2,500. The deed was drawn by his counsel, Mr. W. D. Branch, and declares that it is made "in consideration of the obligations growing out of the peculiar and near relations existing between him and the said Alice Lee Strange, which relations, under a sense of duty not only to her, but to his God, he feels bound to acknowledge, and takes pleasure in heeding; and also in consideration of personal kindnesses and attention shown and services rendered him by the said Alice Lee Strange; as well as in consideration of the earnest request made of him by his wife before and in her last illness."

On the 23d of December, 1881, he conveyed to his daughter Alice, by a deed, the property in Lynchburg, now in question, reserving a life estate to himself. The consideration for this grant the deed declares to be "valuable services rendered him by said Alice Lee Strange, as well as in consideration of the anxious and earnest request made of him by Minnie N. Strange, deceased, his late wife, in her last illness, to make ample provision for the support, comfort and maintenance of the said Alice Lee Strange, which request, having promised faithfully to comply with, he feels to honor bound to obey, and for other considerations him thereto moving."

Having executed and delivered this deed, on the next day, December 28, 1881, he made his will, the one which went to probate, and which was written by his friend and legal adviser, W. D. Branch. By this will he gave all his estate to his daughter, Nannie M., the wife of L. E. Litchford, for life, with remainder over to her children. Beside what he gave to Mrs. Litchford by his will, he had already made large advancements and conveyances of valuable realty to her. Thus he had provided for both his daughters; had satisfied his conscience and his own devoted attachment to his child, Alice, by making good his sacred promise to his dying wife, and, as he vainly thought, had protected his best-loved child from the contingencies of fortune, and the dreaded avarice and hate of his selfish son-in-law.

Alice, having entire confidence in her father, did not put the deed for the Lynchburg property to record, and things remained unchanged until the summer of 1887, when some injudicious friend erroneously advised her that both the deeds to her were void, because no money consideration was named in them. She therefore brought them back to her father, who, at her request, re-conveyed both pieces of property—that in Washington and that in Lynchburg—to her, by two other deeds, bearing date August 18, 1887, wherein he repeats the considerations named in each deed for which they were respectively substituted, and adds in each the words: "And in further consideration of $5, in lawful money of the United States, to him in hand paid by the party of the second part."

His willingness to execute, so as to quiet any apprehensions in regard to the validity of the grant, and his solemn re-affirmation of his motives for making the conveyances, attest the fact that his affection and determination to provide for his "dear child" were as warm and fixed in 1887 as in 1891.

Alice placed the deed to the Lynchburg property on record on the day it was executed, and this became the fiat of doom to her, and to her devoted old father. Up to that time the fact of its existence was known only to her father and to W. D. Branch and to herself, and the jealousy of the Litchfords seems to have slept in the comfortable knowledge that, by the will of 1891, Alice was excluded from all participation in her father's large estate; and they rejoiced in the belief that their father had ignored his sense of duty to his God, had broken his sacred promise to his dying wife, and was rapidly closing his days on earth, unmindful of the child of his best affection, whom he had tenderly nurtured, and of whom he was so proud. The recordation of the deed discovered their error, and rudely shocked their fancied security in the exclusive enjoyment of the whole of their feeble old father's large estate, and roused them into jealous and energetic resistance.

Poor old Strange, in blue and slippered pantaloons, and a condition of senile imbecility, lived at Litchford's house. When a copy of the deed was procured from the clerk's office, the family was thrown into a high state of excitement. Litchford at once set off for Mr. W. D. Branch, the family lawyer, and asked him to come to his store, and then sent him over to his house to see Mr. Strange, who he said was wanting him. Litchford had told Mr. Strange, with impassioned violence, that he would rather see the property burned down than that it should go to Alice; and Mr. Branch, with his mind attuned to Litchford's sentiments (of which his burst of indignation to poor old feeble Strange was doubtless a fair sample), went over to Litchford's house to see the culprit, who had shocked the long latent moral complacency of his son-in-law and daughter by the development of a diversion of a small portion of his large property to his darling child, and, so much, from their jealous and selfish expectation. The old man was sitting on the porch alone, but upon Mr. Branch's arrival, Mrs. Litchford came upon the scene, holding up the offensive deed, and exclaiming: "See what father has done. I don't believe he knew what he was doing when he signed it!" This stormy drama wound up with a demand by Mrs. Litchford upon Mr. Branch to know what must be done; and, on his saying that the law had no remedy, the poor old father, impotently shrinking from the selfish ire which was aroused, said: "I believe I can get Alice to re-convey the property to me. I don't think she will refuse me." This suggestion, which was the real object of the interview, was eagerly caught at, and it was arranged that Mr. Strange, and Mr. Branch to accompany him, at the request of Mrs. Litchford, should take the early train the next morning, and seek Alice down at Chatham, in Pittsylvania County (where she momentarily was on a visit), and get her to re-convey the property, by a deed which Mr. Branch was to carry down, ready made, so that there should be no delay, and no time for reflection or consultation or advice.

The poor old dying man, who, in a week afterwards, was at rest from his sorrow, was taken down to be made the unwilling instrument—a puppet in the hands of the managers—to sacrifice the rights of his dear child, Alice, that his few remaining days might be passed in peace. Had she been brought to him in Lynchburg, she would have had time to think and to confer with friends—even, perchance, to consult counsel; but in Chatham she was without advisers and a stranger, and would the more easily yield to the piteous plight of her tottering old father, and the persuasive presence of the counsel of those who were the real and potent projectors of the scene, and the expectant beneficiaries of the sacrifice.

To Chatham they went, on the 20th of August, 1887, on the early morning train, and found Alice at the house of Polly Davis, on the side of the road which leads from the depot to the village. Polly Davis, it is important to note, was no relative, nor even an acquaintance of Alice Lee Strange, except as a visitor for a few days to a schoolmate acquaintance in Polly Davis' house. As Mr. Strange and Mr. Branch passed the house, Alice was in the yard, saw her father and called him to her, and he and Mr. Branch took breakfast with her and the family. After breakfast Mr. Strange and Mr. Branch went out on the porch, and Alice, after aiding in household duties which were requisite, joined them on the porch and carried on a conversation, chiefly with her father, about her affairs in Washington. This continued for some time, without a word of reference to the object of the visit, when the old father, shrinking from the unwilling task which had been assigned to him, got up and took Mr. Branch out for a walk. All Mr. Branch has revealed of their conversation during that walk is that he, fearing their trip might be in vain, told Mr. Strange that when he got back to the house he must tell Alice of the object of their visit. Mr. Strange is dead, and Alice's mouth is sealed; while Mr. Branch, who was employed by those who were to receive the benefit, to induce this young and unadvised girl, in a moment of sudden and irresistible importunity, and of sympathetic sorrow at the sight of the halting gait, the trembling frame and quivering voice of the poor old father, whom she tenderly loved and on whom she had implicitly relied and trusted as the devoted and faithful protector and author and guide of her life, without reflection, and without the advice of friends, or the counsel of a lawyer, to give away property which was valued at $8,000 or $10,000, and which she had held for over six years—be, Mr. Branch, with all the bias of his employment, and of the unfortunate position and part which he took in the transaction, is permitted to testify as to all the details of the execution and procurement of the deed.

Polly Davis, who is a wholly disinterested and impartial witness, paid no attention, and heard nothing that was said, until she heard Mr. Branch say to Alice: "It will be best for you to make this property back to Mr. Strange, as it was threatened to be burned," and Mr. Strange said, "You shall not lose anything by it"—to which Mr. Branch added, "I will insure you shan't lose anything by it." To all this Alice had little to say, but would not consent.

Finally after they had teased her, she commenced crying, and so did Mr. Strange. Mr. Strange said he would give her the worth in money, or more than the worth of it; and Mr. Branch added, "If it remained like it was, it would be only the land there, and it would do her no good, because the people near there said no colored person should live there." "He (Mr. Strange) seemed very feeble that morning—so weak that when he went to breakfast and had to step down a little step, Alice had to help him, and he caught the side of the door. As to his mind, I don't know, as I was not well acquainted with him, but he seemed to be very easy to weep that morning, for a gentleman."

This statement of Polly Davis has the verisimilitude of consistency, congruity and truth. These gentlemen had come down from Lynchburg to persuade Alice to execute the deed; and, being there, it may be rationally believed they used every argument and persuasion in possible range.

But laying aside the evidence of Polly Davis, and the allegations of the bill, and confining attention strictly to the glimpses of the transaction which are disclosed by Mr. Branch, and his deposition itself proves a case of unconscionable cunning and cruel wrong which calls loudly and imperatively for the righteous interference of a court of equity. On the return of Mr. Strange from the walk with Mr. Branch, with his purpose nerved and his mind impressed by Mr. Branch's admonition of the danger of a failure in the object of their journey, he again took his seat in the porch, and after waiting a short while, said: "Alice, I want you to re-convey back that property to me." "What property?—the property in Washington?" she replied. "No, the property in Lynchburg," said he. "What do you mean? Why do you want me to re-convey it to you?" asked Alice. "My family in Lynchburg," answered Strange, "are very much disturbed about my having given you this property, and Mr. Litchford says he would rather see me burn down all the houses on it than to see me convey it to you. I thought that, as I had done a great deal for you, and had been very kind to you, you would re-convey it to me." "Do you want me to re-convey it to you, without any equivalent?" she replied. "I have no equivalent to offer," said he. After this much, he went out in the yard, and commenced walking backwards and forwards a good deal distressed, says Mr. Branch. But why a good deal distressed, if it was his own hopeful undertaking? Enough to distress him, and to break his faithful heart, and to bring him to the grave into which he sank a few days thereafter, a victim to the mortification, which he keenly felt, of the sacrilegious wrong of violating his solemn promise to his dying wife and robbing a beloved child whom he had pledged his whole life to protect and provide for. The pressure was too great for him; the conflict between his dread of those at home, and his love for the daughter before him, was enough to distress him, knowing, as he did, that he was the helpless instrument in this fraud on her rights; and he abandoned the attempt, fled the scene, and went out into the yard, and walked backwards and forwards in speechless agony; and, while Alice watched him, with pitying eye and wrung heart, from the porch, the cool and cautious Mr. Branch, steady to his undertaking and true to the expectations of those for whom he acted, took up the refrain, and plied the persuasion: "Mr. Strange authorizes me, Miss Alice, to give you $250 if you will re-convey him this property; but I think he relies entirely on your gratitude. Has he not been very kind to you, and given you a great deal? I think, under all the circumstances, you ought to grant his request." "Has Mr. Strange written his will?" she asked. "Yes, I prepared a will for him, which was signed," he replied. He says he did not tell her that in that will there was no provision for her, because she did not ask him. What was the purport and only possible point of her asking him, quickly and sharply, in response to his saying to her that he thought she ought to execute the deed and grant her father's request: "Has Mr. Strange written his will?" But Mr. Branch saw no suppression even in this cautious reserve, and he says, "she seemed very much disturbed, and looking at her father, as he walked backward and forward, she said: 'I can't think of causing him distress in his old age; he has been too kind to me; I will let him have the property back. I will be up in Lynchburg in a few days, and will fix the deed.'" The victory was won, and the persuasions of Mr. Branch, and the sight of her father's speechless but eloquent distress, as he walked back and forth before her in the yard, had overcome the tender hearted girl, and, yielding to the dominion of her filial love and life-long duty and devotion to her father, she said she would be up in Lynchburg in a few days and fix the deed. But no, there was a locus penitentiae in a few days' reflection, and, if she got to Lynchburg, she might have advice and counsel as to her rights; and to avoid this very danger Mr. Branch presented his ready made deed—volunteered to go, and did hurriedly go, for a notary, who came and took and certified the acknowledgment of the deed, with which in his pocket Mr. Branch hurried back to Lynchburg and put it on the record that day—he to receive the plaudit of the Litchford instigators and beneficiaries of the unconscionable wrong; poor old Father Strange to lie down and die, and Alice to console herself with Mr. Branch's gratulating chuckle to her, on the consummation of the rape of her father's bounty, that he thought "she had acted very nobly."

Mr. Branch knew that, in the former wills prepared for Mr. Strange, he had lovingly and lavishly provided for his child Alice; and Alice had been freely and frequently informed of his dispositions and unalterable purpose in her favor; and Mr. Branch knew that Alice knew that he was the legal adviser and confidential friend of her father; and yet, when she, in the extreme stringency and overbearing influence operating upon her to induce consent to the sacrifice which he told her he thought she ought to make, quickly, responsively and pertinently asked him if her father had made his will, he, with wily reserve, did not tell her what, really, it then and there concerned her to know, that she was totally unprovided for in that will which, he told her, he had prepared; and, with his confidential knowledge of its provisions, urged upon her as his opinion that, under all the circumstances, she ought to re-convey the property to her father. Equity grants relief wherever influence is acquired and abused, or confidence reposed and betrayed. Lord Kingsdown in Smith v. Kay, 7 H. L. Cas. 780.

"Equity is especially jealous to guard the welfare of the weaker party in all contracts between parent and child, guardian and ward, attorney and client, trustee and ostendit trust, and, indeed, in all persons standing in fiduciary relations to each other. It is especially active and searching in dealing with gifts, voluntary conveyances, and deeds without due consideration, though its range is so wide as to cover all possible dealings between persons holding such relations, or any relations in which dominion, whether physical, intellectual, moral, religious, domestic or of any sort, may be exercised by one party over the other, or in which the parties contracting are not at arm's length." White & T. Lead. Cas. in Eq. ed 1887, 1184.

In the case of Dent v. Bennett, 4 Myln. & C. 200, Lord Chancellor Cottenham said: "I will not narrow the rule, or run the risk of, in any degree, fettering the exercise of the beneficial jurisdiction of this court, by any enumeration of the description of persons against whom it ought to be most freely used."

In the famous case of Huguenin v. Basley, 14 Ves. Jr. 278, Lord Eldon said: "The question is, not whether she knew what she was doing, had done or proposed to do, but how that intention was produced; whether all that care and providence was placed around her, as against those who advised her, which, from their situation and relation with respect to her, they were bound to exert in her behalf."

Among the relations, the mere existence of which casts suspicion on all business transactions between parties holding them, the one which most excites the jealous watchfulness of a court of equity is that of parent and child, especially where (as in the case at bar) it is the parent who is the beneficiary of the child's bounty, and when that bounty is large and entirely disproportionate to the means of the donor. See Story, Eq. Jur. § 309.

"In respect of bounties by children in favor of their parents, it is for the parent—father or mother—to show that no advantage was taken of his or her influence or knowledge, and that the transaction was fair and conscionable. And the same is true of those standing in affection and influence in loco parentis." Bigelow, Fr (1893) 364.

"Causes of surprise and sudden action, without due deliberation, may properly be referred to the same head of fraud or imposition. An undue advantage is taken of the party, under circumstances which mislead, confuse or disturb the just result of his judgment, and thus expose him to be the victim of the artful, the importunate and the cunning. The surprise here intended must be accompanied with fraud and circumvention, or, at least, by such circumstances as demonstrate that the party had no opportunity to use suitable deliberation, or that there was some influence or management to mislead him. If proper time is not allowed to the party, and he acts improvidently; if he is importunately pressed; if those in whom he most places confidence make use of strong persuasions; if he is not fully aware of the consequences, but is suddenly drawn into the act; if he is not permitted to consult disinterested friends or counsel, before he is called upon to act in circumstances of sudden emergency or unexpected right or acquisition—in these and many like cases, if there has been great inequality in the bargain, courts of equity will assist the party, upon the ground of fraud, imposition or unconscionable advantage."

If Judge Story had been commenting upon the facts of this case, when he wrote this section 351 of his Equity Jurisprudence, he could not have more exactly described every feature, circumstance and character of this revolting transaction.

The leading English cases developing the jurisdiction of courts of equity in cases like the one under review are collected and quoted in the notes to the celebrated case of Huguenin v. Basley, supra. See also Pom. Eq. §§ 951-957; Rhodes v. Bate, L. R. 1 Ch. 253, 257, Bil-lage v. Southes, 9 Hare, 534, 540, Miller v. Simonds, 72 Mo. 600; Wood v. Hadr, 96 N. Y. 414; Archer v. Hudson, 7 Beav. 581, Woodbury v. Woodbury, 141 Mass. 329, 2 New Eng. Rep. 90; Hoghton v. Hoghton, 15 Beav. 278.

In the case of Brulman v. Green, 2 Ves. Jr. 637, and Wilmot's Notes, 61, the grantee carried his own attorney to the grantor to prepare the conveyance; which fact, coupled with the fact that the grantor had no counsel with him, is one of the grounds on which the conveyance was set aside. In that case Lord Commissioner Wilmot, in speaking of Lock's conduct as the attorney of the grantee to procure the conveyance, says: "What was his duty to have done? Why, to have remonstrated, or, at least, with modesty and humility, to have inquired into the principles and motives of such a wild and immoderate act. A man of nice honor would have said in a moment 'As I am an entire stranger to you and your circumstances, and there is something so extraordinary and uncommon in what you [not I, Mr. Branch] propose to do, I will not be concerned in it on any account whatever.' He should at least have protracted the execution of such an extravagant purpose, and should have given time for deliberation."

In that case Lock finished his exploit in five days; in the case at bar Branch, having by his persuasive urgency induced Alice to the wild and immoderate act of giving away her patrimony, and produced the intention of the extraordinary and uncommon gift, so far from protracting the execution and giving time for deliberation, demurred to Alice's proposition to go up to Lynchburg before she signed the deed; produced one ready-made; went for the notary, and the whole matter was completed and he on his return to Lynchburg, inside of one-half hour from the moment that poor, halting, hesitating and reluctant Mr. Strange opened the extraordinary proposal and request to his surprised, perplexed and helpless daughter.

In the case of Statham v. Ferguson, 25 Gratt. 68, Judge Moncre says: "The first thing that strikes our minds in this investigation is the extraordinary haste [one whole week] which occurred in the execution of so important an act, and the circumstances attending its execution."

cution." And yet, in that case, Mrs. Ferguson had the presence and advice of counsel and the presence and witness of several of her neighbors, in her own house, who had been called in to explain the matter to her, and to see that all was fair and right. A unanimous decision of this court affirmed the court below in canceling Mrs. Ferguson's deed and declaring it void, upon the grounds of public policy, as a fraud or imposition upon her rights.

In this case the suggestion or proposal to do the wild and immoderate act did not come from Alice, it was proposed to her by her father, under the coaching and urging admonition of Mr. Branch, and when the poor old father sickened and revolted and fled the scene and relinquished the effort, Mr. Branch renewed the contest, and plied the friendless child with persuasions, and, as she alleges in her bill, and as Polly Davis distinctly proves, with assurances that she should lose nothing by executing the deed and relinquishing her recorded and indefeasible right to $10,000 worth of property without consideration.

We are of the opinion that the circuit court erred in denying the relief prayed for and in dismissing the bill, and that the decree appealed from must therefore be reversed and annulled; and the deed of the 26th of August, 1887, from Alice Lee Strange to Thomas V. Strange, be vacated and set aside.

Decree reversed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT, NORTHERN DISTRICT OF OHIO.

James B. McMULLEN et al.

Samuel J. RITCHIE.

(41 Fed. Rep. 502.)

1. Defendant's absence, and his ignorance of the fact that judgment was entered against him, give him no right to impeach it, where he had appeared in the suit by counsel.

2. A foreign judgment cannot be reviewed for any reasons other than for fraud or want of jurisdiction, where it was rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction, after due service of process, or entry of appearance, and hearing upon the issues.

(February 17, 1890.)

ACTION to enforce payment of the amount alleged to be due under a foreign judgment. On demurrer to the answer. Sustained.

The facts fully appear in the opinion.

Mr. Samuel E. Williamson, for plaintiffs, in support of the demurrer:

This judgment cannot be attacked in the manner attempted in the answer.

Messrs. Stevenson Burke and J. E. Ingersoll for defendant, contra.

Ricks, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs instituted this suit to recover from the defendant the sum of $238,000, with interest, which they allege the defendant is legally obligated to pay because of a judgment for that sum rendered in plaintiffs' favor in the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of NOTE.—Judgment not subject to collateral impeachment.

It is conclusively settled that a judgment can only be impeached in a court of equity for fraud in its conception. New York v. Brady, 115 N. Y. 615; Story, Eq. § 1575.

That it is conclusive upon the parties and those in privity with them as to matter within its jurisdiction, is fundamental. New York v. Brady, supra; Stillwell v. Carpenter, 59 N. Y. 423.

In collateral proceedings, the validity of judgments of courts of record will not be inquired into. Holliday v. Jackson, 4 West. Rep. 283, 21 Mo. App. 660; Turner v. Malona, 24 S. C. 899; Lowery v. Howard, 1 West. Rep. 487, 103 Ind. 440; Union Trust Co. v. Southern L. N. & I. Co. 130 U. S. 565 (33 L. ed. 1043).

It cannot be questioned except upon the ground of want of jurisdiction. Paul v. Smith, 83 Ky. 451.

If erroneous, they must be corrected by appeal; if irregular, they must be set aside by a motion in the cause, made in a reasonable time. Ward v. Lowndes, 96 N. C. 397.

Irregularities in the course of judicial proceedings do not render them void or the judgment open to collateral impeachment. Kelley v. People, 8 West. Rep. 47, 115 Ill. 588; Lewis v. Morrow, 5 West. Rep. 8 L. R. A.

408, 89 Mo. 174; Mount v. Manhattan Co. 3 Cent. Rep. 353, 41 N. J. Eq. 211; Millard v. Marmon, 4 West. Rep. 192, 116 Ill. 849; Roberts v. Flanagan, 21 Neb. 503; Spoors v. Coen, 6 West. Rep. 812, 44 Ohio St. 497.

Where the court has jurisdiction both of the subject matter and of the parties, the general rule is that the judgment, although erroneous, is valid until reversed on appeal or writ of error. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Hook, 6 West. Rep. 627, 118 Ill. 587; McMillan v. Longoy, 2 West. Rep. 817, 115 Ill. 428; Reid v. Morton, 6 West. Rep. 709, 119 Ill. 193.

When there is any notice, no matter how irregular and defective, it is sufficient. Judgment based thereon will not be treated as void upon collateral attack. McMullen v. State, 2 West. Rep. 785, 105 Ind. 834.

It is sufficient if the record, with its legal inferences and presumptions, shows these facts. Pope v. Harrison, 16 Lea, 82.

A judgment cannot be attacked for fraud, in collateral proceedings, by one privy to it. Brown v. Woody, 4 West. Rep. 326, 22 Mo. App. 253.

But a judgment may be impeached collaterally as void, when rendered against a party that has not been served with process. Blanton v. Carroll (Va.) 13 Va. L. J. 364. See note to Wiese v. San Francisco M. F. Society (Cal.) 7 L. R. A. 577.

Justice for Ontario. The amended petition sets forth the provisions of the original contract upon which the judgment was based, and avers that said action was brought upon said agreement; that plaintiffs prayed that said agreement might be specifically performed, or that they might have damages for the breach thereof, that a proper answer was filed by defendant, setting forth fully his defenses to said suit; and that, upon a trial, judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiffs for said sum. The defendant in his answer avers that the contract sued upon in Canada was an accommodation contract, with the full understanding that the same was never to be performed, and that, if the defendant was compelled to pay said judgment, he would be compelled to pay the same without any consideration, and seeks to have the issues set forth in his answer in the Canada case presented and tried in this suit. The answer does not deny the authority of the attorney to enter his appearance in the Canada suit, nor does he deny that he filed an answer in said case setting up the same defense now sought to be made in this court. Having by his appearance and answer submitted to the jurisdiction of the Canada court, and having presented matters of defense which that court must have passed upon in rendering the judgment set forth in the amended petition, the question now to be determined is: Can he be permitted in this court to re-try the same matters of defense presented in the Canada suit? It is not material that the judgment in said case was rendered in defendant's absence, and without his knowledge, as he avers in his answer here, because that court had full jurisdiction of the subject matter and of the defendant, through his entry of appearance by his counsel. Every intendment, therefore, is in favor of the regularity of its proceedings and of the validity of its judgment, as it is not now attempted to impeach it for fraud. The case, therefore, fairly presents for consideration the force and effect to be given by this court to a judgment rendered by a foreign court in a suit between the same parties; the jurisdiction of the subject matter and of the person having been properly acquired, and the proceedings being unimpeached for fraud.

Counsel for defendant have cited the cases of Burnham v. Water, 1 Woodb. & M. 179; Buttrick v. Allen, 8 Mass. 273, Bank of Australasia v. Harding, 9 C. B. 688; Lyman v. Brown, 2 Curt. 559; Wood v. Gamble, 11 Cush. 8, and Schuler v. Israel, 120 U. S. 508 [30 L. ed. 707]. In the first case cited the doctrine is recognized that the foreign judgment is only prima facie evidence as between the parties to it; and Mr. Justice Woodbury, in that case, granted a new trial because the trial judge had refused to allow testimony to go to the jury impeaching the judgment for mistake and irregularity, although the foreign court in which it was rendered, had full jurisdiction of the subject matter and parties. The learned judge in that case said:

"I would allow the opposing party, where a foreign judgment is sued, pleaded or offered in evidence, to rebut its prima facie force and obligation by showing that the merits of the claim now in controversy were not, in truth, at all there considered and adjudged; and I would do that whether it occurred by accident or mistake, or any agreement of the parties, or any other excusable cause, as well as when it arose from the want of personal service."

Other courts, in cases arising about that same period,—nearly half a century ago,—held the same doctrine. But later decisions, in cases more carefully considered and better reasoned, give greater force and dignity to the records of foreign courts, not only as a matter of comity, but for the better reason that when parties have once had their day in a court of competent jurisdiction, after due service of process or after entry of appearance, and have had a full and impartial hearing upon the merits of their case as made in the pleadings, they should be bound by the judgment of that tribunal, unless they can show its proceedings were tainted with fraud. Counsel for plaintiff has cited the following authorities, which fully sustain the doctrine just stated: Bank of Foreign judgments.

The decision of a foreign court of competent jurisdiction is conclusive. Rapelle v. Emery, 5 U. S. 8 Dall. 221 (1 L. ed. 331); Crounson v. Leonard, 8 U. S. 4 Cranch, 231 (3 L. ed. 470).

It is conclusive as to its own jurisdiction so far as it depends on municipal rules. Ross v. Himely, 9 U. S. 4 Cranch, 241 (3 L. ed. 435); Hudson v. Gunstler, 8 U. S. 4 Cranch, 250 (3 L. ed. 435).

Where the judgment is conclusive between parties in the State where it was rendered, it is equally so in every other State and court in the United States. Christies v. Russell, 12 U. S. 5 Wall. 220 (12 L. ed. 475).

A judgment or decree of one State, made by a court having jurisdiction of the parties and the subject, has the same force when pleaded or offered in evidence in the courts of any other State as in the State where it was rendered. Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Harris, 7 U. S. 211 (2 L. ed. 529).

To make a record of a state judgment valid upon its face, it is only necessary for it to appear that the court had jurisdiction of the subject matter of the action and of the parties, and that a judgment had in fact been rendered. Marshall v. Stewart, 25 U. S. 21 Wall. 71, 25 U. S. 21 Wall. 77 (25 L. ed. 524).

Judgments and decrees of courts of any State are res judicata whenever questioned in any sister State, provided there was personal service or an appearance of the parties to the suit in the State where the judgment was rendered. Sayre v. Harpold (W. Va.) March 15, 1890.

A court of another State in which a judgment was entered is the proper one to redress the wrong if it was entered by fraud or collusion. Wyoming Mfg. Co. v. Mohler (Pa.) March 11, 1890.

In an action on a foreign judgment, where it appears that the court rendering it was a court of record having a judge and clerk and a seal, the presumption is in favor of its jurisdiction and the regularity of its proceedings. Bailly v. Martin, 119 Ind. 101.

The certificate stating that the transcript is a "true and correct copy" of the judgment, is not defective because it does not state that it is a "true and complete copy." Ibid.

A personal judgment rendered under a foreign law by a foreign court will not be enforced where, on the face of the record, it appears that jurisdiction of the person was not obtained. Shepard v. Wright, 112 N. Y. 221.

See note to Astell v. Huntington (Md.) 3 L. R. A. 772.

Australasia v. Nias, 16 Ad. & El. N. S. 717; Godard v. Gray, L. R. 6 Q. B. 189; Scott v. Pilkington, 2 Best & S. 11; Lasier v. Westcott, 26 N. Y. 146; Baker v. Palmer, 83 Ill. 568.

In the case of Godard v. Gray, decided in 1870 in the Court of Queen's Bench, the prior decisions in England are reviewed, and the learned judge concluded that the law was then well settled in the English courts that the judgment of a foreign tribunal having jurisdiction over the party and the cause cannot be impeached on the ground that it was erroneous on the merits, or that to an action on such judgment the judgment debtor could not defend that the tribunal mistook either the law or the facts. The Court of Appeals of the State of New York, in the case above noted, after a thorough review of the decisions of the courts in England and America, approves the reasoning of Chancellor Kent and Justice Story, and says that the same principles and decisions made as to judgments from the courts of other States of the Union should be applied to foreign judgments. The court, after quoting freely from Justice Story in favor of the absolute conclusiveness of the foreign judgments, except in cases in which the court which pronounced the judgment had not due jurisdiction of the case and of the defendant, or the proceeding was in fraud or founded in palpable mistake or irregularity, or bad by the law of res judicata, approves his views as eminently correct and most in harmony with sound principles and the best considered cases. The court in the same opinion quotes from Justice Story, and says:

"Holding that the judgment was only to be regarded as prima facie evidence for the plaintiff," he correctly says, "would be a mere delusion if the defendant might still question it by opening all or any of the original merits on his side; for under such circumstances it would be equivalent to granting a new trial."

If the action of the court of original jurisdiction, having the parties and the subject matter properly before it, is to be reviewed and its judgment to be treated as only prima facie evidence for the judgment creditor, in what class of cases is the court of second or third resort to go behind the original judgment and re-try the case on its merits? Is it to do so where, in its opinion, the court of original jurisdiction was not one of equal learning or of equal rank, or where the judgment debtor, through want of diligence, or because of the lack of seal or ability of his counsel, did not secure as full and intelligent an examination of his defense as he should have had? If the original judgment is to be reviewed for any reasons other than for fraud and for want of jurisdiction, where is the boundary line of the reviewing court to be fixed? Mr. Justice Woodbury, in his opinion in the case cited by defendant's counsel, opens the door as wide as possible and authorizes the court to explore the whole field covered by the issues made in the original suit, and to review its proceedings upon all or any one of the issues there made and not fully considered, whether by accident or mistake, or for any excusable cause. I cannot approve such doctrine. It would destroy the force and effect of judicial proceedings and make the judgments of a foreign tribunal, no matter how high its rank or how binding its decisions within its own jurisdiction, of little greater effect than the original contract or promise sued upon. I think the doctrine as maintained by the later English and American cases, to which reference has been made, has advanced the courts one stage in the progress of simplifying the administration of justice. It is important that there should be a limitation to litigation, and that parties, as to matters upon which they had a full hearing in the court of original and competent jurisdiction, should not be permitted to open and re-try issues once fairly determined whenever and wherever they have an opportunity to do so, by defending against judgments rendered in a foreign country to which they were properly made parties. I am therefore of the opinion that the judgment set out in the amended petition in this case has the same force and effect as a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction in one of the States of this Union, and is conclusive against the defendant of the matters therein adjudged.

The demurrer to the answer will therefore be allowed.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

MAYOR, etc., OF SAVANNAH et al.,

v.

Joseph D. WEED et al.

(....Ga....)

A constitutional provision that taxation shall be "ad valorem on all property subject to be taxed" is violated by an ordinance imposing a tax of 3 1-3 per cent on real estate, 8-10 per cent on bank stock and 1-3 per cent upon all other personal property.

(March 14, 1890.)

ERROR to the Superior Court for Chatham County to review a judgment enjoining the collection of certain taxes. Affirmed.

NOTE.—Taxation ad valorem; constitutional provision.

The Constitutions of some States require property to be taxed in proportion to its value; but this does not affect the power of the Legislature to impose indirect taxes on persons, or on business pursuits, or on the franchises of corporations. 1 Dexty, 8 L. R. A.

Taxn. 304; Mobile v. Dargan, 45 Ala. 510; Mobile v. Royal Street R. Co., Id. 322; O'Kane v. Treat, 25 Ill. 537; People v. Thurber, 13 Ill. 554; St. Louis v. Green, 7 Mo. App. 498; Croamer v. Allen, 3 Mo. App. 545.

Under such a constitutional provision the assessor must ascertain values in the manner provided by law. Hyatt v. Allen, 54 Cal. 353.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Chisholm, Erwin & Du Bignon, for plaintiffs in error:

The Constitution of 1869 provided that "taxation on property shall be ad valorem only and uniform on all species of property taxed."

Art. 1, § 27.

Discrimination in rates of taxation was permissible under that Constitution.

Wilson v. Augusta Factory, 44 Ga. 889; Augusta v. Augusta Nat. Bank, 47 Ga. 583; Waring v. Savannah, 60 Ga. 97.

Paragraph 1 of § 11 of art. 7 of the Georgia Constitution of 1877 was adopted substantially from art. 9, § 1, of the Constitution of Pennsylvania.

The right of all taxing powers in Pennsylvania within their respective territorial limits, to separate property into classes and to impose different rates of taxation thereon, was settled by the highest court of that State before the adoption into the Georgia Constitution of this clause of the Pennsylvania Constitution.

When in the Constitution of one State a provision contained in the Constitution of another State, where it has received a settled judicial interpretation, is adopted, that interpretation is deemed to be adopted with it.

It has long been the settled policy and practice in this State to divide property into classes for the purpose of assessing it for taxation.

This construction having been given to the constitutional provision, it has become a settled rule of property, and in such case it is better to let it stand, although subsequent experience may have satisfied members of this court that it is an erroneous one.

Messrs. O'Connor & O'Byrne, for defendants in error:

The only classification of property relatively to taxation which is made or authorized is into exempt property and property subject to be taxed; and taxation on all property subject to be taxed is required to be ad valorem—that is, according to value. If exempt, it pays nothing; if subject, the amount it shall pay is measured by multiplying the fixed rate into the actual value.

Simmons, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Weed et al., by petition, complained that the marshal of Savannah had levied upon a lot of land belonging to them in that City an execution for the four-quarters tax due by them upon two lots of land, under the tax ordinance of the City. This ordinance was passed by the municipal corporation on December 22, 1883, and

It does not require a uniform method of valuation, but only such regulations as shall secure a just valuation of property, both real and personal. Louisville & N. A. R. Co. v. State, 25 Ind. 180; Wisconsin Cent. R. Co. v. Taylor Co. 53 Wis. 79; Johnson v. Mason, 33 Ga. 545.

Such provision does not require that all property in the State shall be taxed, but that any species of property selected for taxation shall be taxed in proportion to its value. State v. North, 27 Mo. 484; Stratton v. Collins, 49 N. J. L. 302; Williamson v. Mamey, 33 Gratt. 361.

The words "ought to be taxed," are to be construed as mandatory. State v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 75 Mo. 312; Hamilton v. St. Louis Co. Ct. 15 Mo. 2; St. Louis v. Green, 1 Mo. App. 408; American Life Assn. v. St. Louis Co. 49 Mo. 513.

Local assessments for local improvements are not "taxes" such as are required to be assessed under this provision. Vassar v. Georgia, 47 Minn. 712; White v. People, 94 Ill. 504.

Statutory provisions whereby different classes of property are listed and valued for taxation in and by different modes and agencies are not necessarily in conflict with this provision. German Nat. Bank v. Kimball, 108 U. S. 728 (25 L. ed. 400); Wagoner v. Loomis, 37 Ohio St. 571.

The provision in the Ohio Constitution is that "all property of every description in the State shall be taxed by a uniform rule, and at its true value in money" (Ohio Const. art. 12, § 2; Columbus Exch. Bank v. Hines, 3 Ohio, 15), the rule being more restrictive on the power of the Legislature than the provisions of the Wisconsin Constitution. See Wisconsin Cent. R. Co. v. Taylor Co. 53 Wis. 79; Knowlton v. Rock Co. 3 Wis. 416.

3 L. R. A.

The tax ordinance of the Village of Summerville, Georgia, for the year 1887, imposing a tax of $\frac{1}{4}$ of 1 per cent ad valorem upon real estate only, is void by reason of conflict with the Georgia Constitution in not laying the tax ad valorem upon all property, real and personal, subject to be taxed within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax. Verdery v. Summerville, 33 Ga. 138.

Although the power of a municipal corporation to tax is not conferred by the North Carolina Constitution, when such power is exercised the Constitution compels the taxation of all property therein, and that it shall be taxed according to its true value in money and by a uniform rule. Redmond v. Tarboro (N. C.) 7 L. R. A. 688.

Under the Constitution of North Carolina all property of whatever description, and not merely that selected for taxation by the Legislature, must be taxed. Const. art. 7, § 2; Redmond v. Tarboro (N. C.) 7 L. R. A. 688.

The word "property" includes moneys, credits, investments and other choses in action. Redmond v. Tarboro, supra.

The constitutional provisions which declare that "all taxes levied on property shall be assessed in exact proportion to the value of such property," and inhibit the levy of "a greater rate of taxation than three fourths of 1 per cent on the value of taxable property within this State" (art. 11, §§ 1, 4), prescribe a rule and limit of taxation on property, but do not include all the legitimate subjects of taxation, some of which are not susceptible of determinate value. Western U. Tel. Co. v. State Board of Assessment, 20 Ala. 371.

imposed a tax of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent upon real estate within the corporate limits, and of $\frac{1}{2}$ of 1 per cent upon all personal property, except shares in banks and banking associations, upon which a tax of only $\frac{1}{4}$ of 1 per cent was imposed. This tax ordinance the petitioners alleged to be illegal and void, because it violated the provisions of article 7, § 2, par. 1, of the Constitution (Code, § 5181). They prayed, among other things, that an ad interim injunction might issue against the municipal corporation and the marshal, enjoining them from proceeding to enforce the collection of the tax until the final determination of the cause. The defendants answered, and insisted that the ordinance complained of and the execution mentioned in the petition were legal and valid. Upon the hearing, the trial judge granted the injunction. The mayor and aldermen excepted, and assigned the same as error.

The learned and able counsel for the plaintiff in error contended that this judgment was erroneous, because, under the above section of the Constitution, the municipal authorities of Savannah had the power and authority to classify the subjects of taxation, and to require a tax of a different rate upon realty from that required by them on personal property. They also contended that this clause of the Constitution was borrowed from the Constitution of Pennsylvania; that the construction put upon it by the courts of Pennsylvania is binding upon the courts of this State; and that the construction of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania is that, under this clause of their Constitution, the Legislature has authority to classify property so that one species may be taxed more than another. We are inclined to think that if this clause had been wholly borrowed from the Constitution of Pennsylvania, and the Supreme Court of that State had put this construction upon it before it was adopted into our Constitution, we would be bound by that construction. But we do not agree with counsel that the clause under consideration was taken wholly from the Pennsylvania Constitution. There are qualifying words in the clause as it stands in our Constitution which in our opinion prohibit the Legislature or a municipal council from classifying property as was done in this case, and which render its meaning entirely different from that of the Pennsylvania Constitution.

The Constitution of Pennsylvania on this subject is as follows: "All taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects, within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax, and shall be levied and collected under general laws." Our Constitution upon this subject reads as follows: "All taxation shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects, and ad valorem on all property subject to be taxed, within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax, and shall be levied and collected under general laws." If our Constitution were an exact copy of the Pennsylvania Constitution upon this subject, we would most certainly agree with the learned counsel for the plaintiff in error, that property might be classified, and different rates of taxation put upon it; but we think that when the framers of our Constitution interjected into the clause the words, "and ad valorem on all property subject to be taxed," it was their intention that there should be no classification of property so that it might be taxed at different rates. Property is not the only subject of taxation. "Everything to which the legislative power extends may be the subject of taxation, whether it be persons or property, or possession, franchise or privilege, or occupation or right." Coolay, Taxu. 5.

We think that this clause refers to subjects of taxation other than property, and means that if one kind of business, privilege, franchise or right, etc., is taxed, the tax shall be uniform upon all of that class. For instance, if liquor dealers are taxed, the tax as to all liquor dealers shall be uniform; if draymen are taxed for carrying on their business, the tax shall be uniform as to all of that class, or if butchers, lawyers, physicians, dentists and photographers are taxed, the tax need not be the same upon all of these, but shall be uniform as to each one of these classes. Upon this subject, see Outlaw v. Albany, 60 Ga. 597; Wheper v. Sumter County, 56 Ga. 535; Davis v. Macon, 64 Ga. 125.

The Legislature or municipal authorities are not bound to tax any occupation or business within their territorial limits, but when they undertake to tax one class of business or occupation the same tax must be levied on all members of that class. We think the plain meaning of this clause of the Constitution is that the Legislature or municipal authorities may classify all subjects of taxation, and make the tax uniform on each class. They can tax some classes or not, as they see proper. They can tax one class and exempt the others; but when they do tax a particular class, the rate must be uniform as to all of that class. When, however, they come to deal with property, a different rule prevails. If property is taxed, all of it must be taxed except that exempted in the Constitution. The Legislature or municipal authorities can make no exemption as to property; it must be taxed, and taxed according to its value. Though property is a subject of taxation, the Constitution treats it as but one subject, and prescribes the rule of uniformity as to it by saying that all of it subject to be taxed shall be taxed ad valorem. And if it must be taxed, and taxed according to its value, we cannot see how it can be classified anew, and one rate put upon real estate, a lower rate upon personal property generally, and a still lower rate upon shares in banks and banking associations. If one man has a thousand dollars worth of personal property, and another a thousand dollars worth of real estate, and another a thousand dollars worth of shares in a banking company, it must bear the same rate of taxation. Each must bear the same burden in support of the government which protects the owner and his property. This rule is equitable and just to all parties, and the rule prescribed by the ordinance of the City of Savannah is, in our opinion, inequitable and unjust. Under that ordinance a man who owns a thousand dollars worth of real estate has to pay for the support of the government $21.25, the man who owns a thousand dollars worth of personal property other than bank stock has to pay $5, and the man who owns a thousand dollars worth of bank stock has to pay only $3. In our judgment, the words, "ad valorem on all property subject to be taxed," were embodied in this clause of the Constitution for the express purpose of prohibiting such unjust and unequal taxation as this. We adopt in this decision that part of the opinion of the chief justice in the case of Verdery v. Summerville, 82 Ga. 138, which treats of the proper construction of this clause of our Constitution, and for the reasons we have given above, and the reasons assigned in that opinion, we affirm the judgment of the court below. We express no opinion as to injunction being the proper remedy in a case like this, as the point was not made, and we were requested to affirm this judgment if we decided that the constitutional question made was against the plaintiff in error.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTE.—Hawkers and peddlers defined.

Any method of selling goods, wares or merchandise by outcry on the streets or public places of the city, or by attracting persons to purchase goods by placards or signals, or by going from house to house, selling, or offering goods for sale, at retail, whether the goods be carried along for delivery presently, or whether the sales are made for future delivery, constitutes the person so selling a hawker or peddler, within the meaning of Rev. Stat. 1881, § 3106, subd. 23. Grafty v. Rushville, 5 West. Rep. 558, 107 Ind. 502.

A person selling goods from door to door as an agent of the manufacturers at a salary, with no personal interest in the goods or their proceeds, is a peddler, within the meaning of the Pennsylvania Act prohibiting peddling in Schuylkill County. See note to Com. v. Gardner (Pa.) 7 L. R. A. 686.

The right of "acquiring, possessing and protecting property," given by the Pennsylvania Constitution, does not include the right to sell goods as a peddler, when that is prohibited by statute. Ibid.

A peddler is an itinerant individual, ordinarily without local habitation or place of business, who travels about the country carrying commodities for sale. Davenport v. Rice, 75 Iowa. 74.

Under the amended Statutes of Alabama the phrase "peddlers of medicines or other articles of like character" does not include a vendor of medicines renting a vacant lot in a city and erecting a tent thereon, and selling medicines without solicitation or delivery outside the tent. Randolph v. Yellowstone Kit, 55 Ala. 471.

One who goes about repairing and erecting lightning-rods for people who employ him, and furnishes the necessary material to do it, but sells nothing that he does not affix to the house, is not a peddler within the meaning of the Georgia Code. Exell v. Thresher, 78 Ga. 617.

place to place with a sample stove carried upon a wagon, exhibit the sample and procure orders, which his employer afterwards fills by delivering through other agents the stoves so ordered, is a peddler, within the meaning of the Code of Georgia. But though a peddler, if he is a citizen and resident of Virginia, and the orders he solicits and procures are for stoves belonging to a Missouri corporation, which the latter holds in Missouri, and keeps there until they are thus ordered, he is protected by the Constitution of the United States, as lately construed by the supreme court, against the provisions of the Code requiring a license to peddle, and declaring a forfeiture for not procuring such license.

*3. The parts of the record specified in the bill of exceptions being as follows, "The petition and exhibit thereto attached, marked 'A,' and the answer of the defendants,"—Held, that the writ of error covers nothing else, and that an affidavit verifying the petition, an acknowledgment of service on the petition, an order of the judge appointing a time and place for hearing the application for injunction, and a final order denying the injunction, are not included in the specification, and that the clerk had no warrant or authority for incorporating these things in his certified transcript. These superfluous matters are wholly immaterial to the errors assigned, and this court has no use for them.

ERROR to the Superior Court for Floyd County to review a judgment in favor of defendants in an action brought to enjoin the enforcement of an execution and to have the same canceled. Reversed.

Taking orders for goods to be manufactured is not peddling; neither is the sale, by the person taking such orders, of a few articles in a law office where there is no evidence of any offer to sell in any other place. Spencer v. Whiting, 66 Iowa, 878.

One who solicits orders for a local firm on samples is not a peddler. Davenport v. Rice, supra.

Peddler's License.

An ordinance "to license hawkers, peddlers and auctioneers" is not invalid on the ground that it delegates to the licensee the power to determine the time for which the license shall be granted. State v. Redmon (Miss.) May 7, 1890.

Nor is an ordinance invalid, on the ground that it delegates to the village recorder the ministerial or clerical act of issuing it when it has been granted by the council; nor on the ground that the license fee, which is fixed at $3 per day, is excessive. Ibid.

Where a tax was levied on a firm for peddling out clocks, cooking stoves or ranges over the county, it can be collected but once, and the number of agents, wagoners or teamsters employed is discretionary. Ex parte Butin, 38 Tex. App. 304.

An ordinance requiring hawkers or peddlers not residents of the city to take out a license for the sale of goods not the growth or manufacture of the county is void. Grafty v. Rushville, 5 West. Rep. 558, 107 Ind. 502.

The provision of the Pennsylvania Act, which discriminates in the amount of license for hawkers in certain counties, required from residents and nonresidents, is repealed by the Supplementary Act of March 14, 1867. Com. v. Shaffer, 139 Pa. 675.

License to hawkers and peddlers, see note to State v. Richards (W. Va.) 3 L. R. A. 705.

The facts were officially reported to this court as follows:

The Wrought Iron Range Company, a corporation of Missouri, and E. N. S. Lee, a citizen of and resident of Virginia, by their petition, made the following allegations:

"The Range Company manufactures and sells ranges made for cooking purposes at the Company's works in St. Louis, and sold by their agents, by samples throughout the United States, in the following manner: The Company furnishes each agent a team and wagon and a sample range, with which the agent travels over the territory allotted to him, and, by exhibiting the sample, takes orders, for the Company, for the purchase of such ranges from persons desiring to buy, and transmits the orders to the superintendent of the Company at his headquarters, which are sometimes in such territory, and sometimes in another State; and the Company thereupon, from its home office and place of business, fills the orders through the superintendent, and delivers the ranges as the orders are taken. But in no case do the agents sell or deliver the sample ranges intrusted to them. The Company has no place of business in Georgia. Ranges are sometimes stored in warehouses, after they are sold by sample, until delivered to the purchasers. On February 6, 1890, the Range Company furnished Lee with two mules and a wagon and sample range, and he went into Floyd County therewith, and by exhibiting the sample, took an order for a range from one of the citizens of the county, and forwarded this order to the superintendent of the Range Company at Rome, and thereupon the Company accepted the order and delivered the range, in the manner above stated, to the purchaser. The Ordinary of Floyd County, having been informed of the facts and circumstances above stated, demanded both of the Range Company and of Lee, under the provisions of sections 529 and 1681 of the Code, $50 for a license to peddle such ranges in Floyd County, and, when petitioners refused to pay the same, issued executions against them for it, which were levied by the deputy sheriff of Floyd County on the mules, wagon and sample range. The Ordinary also issued an execution against them for an alleged forfeiture of $100, under section 586 of the Code, and caused it to be levied on said property; and the sheriff, by direction of the Ordinary, has also levied both the fl. fas. on a trunk belonging to Lee, and threatens to arrest Lee under said process if the license fee and forfeiture are not otherwise collected from petitioners, and from each of them. Petitioners denied that they, or either of them, are peddlers of stoves or ranges, or are liable to take out or to pay a license, as peddlers to the Ordinary, under said section of the Code, or otherwise, or that they, or either of them, are liable, on account of their failure to take out and pay for such licenses, to the forfeiture claimed by the Ordinary. Section 1681 of the Code, so far as it applies to them, and each of them, is unconstitutional, in that it contravenes, and is repugnant to, article 1, § 8, par. 3, of the Constitution of the United States."

Petitioners pray for an injunction against the Ordinary and sheriff; that the execution may be canceled; and for general relief. At 6 L. R. A.

tached to the petition was a copy of the execution, and the levy thereon.

The defendant admitted the allegations of the petition to be true, but denied the conclusions drawn therefrom, and alleged that the petitioners were both peddlers, and liable to the tax and forfeiture.

The application for temporary injunction was heard on the pleadings, and the injunction prayed for was refused.

To this decision petitioners excepted.

M. J. Branham, for plaintiffs in error:

The provisions of the Code requiring peddlers to obtain a license are not applicable to petitioners.

Mr. C. Tharrell for defendants in error.

Mockley, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts are sufficiently stated in the official report.

1. The provisions of the Code under which the Ordinary proceeded furnished no warrant or authority for issuing an execution against the owner of goods because they are peddled or sold by sample through an itinerant agent. This question was virtually ruled in Howard v. Reid, 51 Ga. 328. In that case it was held that the person to whom the license to peddle is to be granted is he who travels and vends the goods, and that a process issued under section 586 of the Code against others on the ground that they, by their agent, peddled, etc., without a license, is upon its face illegal and void. That case governs this, in so far as the nonresident corporation is concerned. A corporation cannot be a peddler, or obtain license to peddle, under the laws of this State. No one can obtain such license who cannot be sworn, for every peddler has to take an oath. Code, § 1634.

Every itinerant trader by sample is treated as a peddler. Id. § 1681.

The itinerant trader is the person who actually travels, or passes from place to place, for the purpose of trading by sample or otherwise. Within the sense and meaning of the Code, when one adopts that vocation, and pursues it, he becomes a peddler, and by that name or description is to be licensed. Gould v. Atlanta, 55 Ga. 694.

The execution issued in the present case alleges peddling and selling as peddlers, without first obtaining license to peddle, and without paying the charges fixed by section 529 of the Code, which section prescribes a charge of $50 for a license to peddle. The execution is for the collection of $100 as a forfeiture, and the law declaring the forfeiture is found in section 583 of the Code, under which section the person who incurs it is one who peddles without first obtaining a license to do so. From what we have said, it follows conclusively that this execution could not rightfully be enforced against the Wrought Iron Range Company.

Indeed, as to that corporation, it was and is an utter nullity.

2. The next question relates to the validity of the execution as against Lee, the person who actually itinerated, and exhibited a sample stove, for the purpose of obtaining orders in behalf of the corporation for stoves manufactured in the State of Missouri, and to be forwarded from thence to this State in filling orders so obtained. Lee is a citizen and resident of Virginia, and plies his vocation in Georgia to obtain orders for goods manufactured in Missouri, and not brought within this State until after ordered through him by purchasers, or those desiring to purchase. As he carries his sample stove from place to place upon a wagon drawn by mules, and exhibits the same as a means of trading, or inducing offers to trade, he is doubtless a peddler, within the true sense and meaning of the Code.

Section 1631 reads as follows: "Every peddler or itinerant trader, by sample or otherwise, must apply to the ordinary of each county where he may desire to trade for a license, which shall be granted to him on the terms said ordinary has or may impose. They are authorized to impose such tax as they may deem advisable, to be used for county purposes. The license extends only to the limits of the county."

Section 1635 requires a license for every wagon or other vehicle employed or used in vending such goods, wares or merchandise.

Section 538 is as follows: "If any person, except a disabled soldier of this State, peddles, without first obtaining such license, in counties where the ordinaries take no action regulating peddling, he forfeits to the county $100 for the first act of peddling, and for each month thereafter $25 more."

We should consider these provisions decisive of the case as to Lee, could they be held constitutional in their application to him, and the business in which he is engaged. But this cannot be held consistently with the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in Robbins v. Shelby County Tanning Dist., 120 U. S. 489 [30 L. ed. 694], and Ashe v. Texas, 128 U. S. 129 [32 L. ed. 868]. These cases rule that statutes of Tennessee and Texas, not more obnoxious than our own to the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States, are void, for their conflict with that Constitution, in so far as they extend to soliciting orders, and making sales, by and for nonresidents of the State within which the business required to be licensed is transacted. After full examination we can have no doubt that these decisions apply to the present case, and control it. This being so, the matter admits of no further discussion at our hands. After the State has yielded to the federal army, it can very well afford to yield to the federal judiciary. Our sister States, Alabama and Louisiana, have so done. State v. Agee, 83 Ala. 110; Simmons Hardware Co. v. McGuire, 89 La. Ann. 848.

The doctrine of co-equality and co-ordination between the Supreme Court of Georgia and the Supreme Court of the United States, so vigorously announced by Benning, J., in Padelford v. Savannah, 14 Ga. 489, regarded now from a practical standpoint, seems visionary. Its application to this or any like case would be a jarring discord in the harmony of the law. Moreover any attempt to apply it effectively would be no less vain than discordant. When we know with certainty that a question arising under the Constitution of the United States has been definitely decided by the supreme court of that government, it is our duty to accept the decision, for the time being, as correct, whether it coincides with our own opinion or not. Any failure of due subordination on our part would be a breach, rather than the administration, of law. The judge of the superior court erred in not granting the injunction prayed for.

Judgment reversed.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK of Creston

v.

C. W. CARROLL and Wife, Appts.

(.....Iowa.....)

A guaranty that cattle of another person will sell in market for four cents per pound, made in consideration of the payment of $30, and an agreement by the other party to pay the guarantor any excess in the selling price above four cents per pound, is a gambling contract.

(May 10, 1890.)

NOTE.—Wagering contracts, void. See notes to Sprague v. Warren (Neb.) 3 L. R. A. 679; Harvey v. Merrill (Mass.) 5 L. R. A. 200.

A negotiable note growing out of a wager contract is invalid even in the hands of an innocent holder. Snoddy v. American Nat. Bank (Tenn.) 7 L. R. A. 705.

3 L. R. A.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Union County in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover the amount alleged to be due upon a promissory note. Reversed.

Statement by Granger, J.:

Action on a promissory note for $150. The execution of the note is admitted, but alleged to be void because given in fulfillment of a gambling contract, of which the following is a copy:

Creston, Iowa, December 5, 1888.

In consideration of $80.00 paid me this day by L. J. Cusick, I hereby guarantee to him that the five cars of cattle shipped by Cusick Bros., on December 3, to Chicago, shall sell in Chicago for four (4) cents per pound, and he having a one-half interest in said cattle, I agree to make good to him any loss by reason of said cattle selling for less than four cents. That is, I am to pay him the difference, if any, between the price the cattle sell for and four cents on his half interest, in case they sell for less than four cents. Said difference to be paid to him on receipt of account sale, and, if said cattle sell for more than four cents, I am to have the difference.

C. W. Carroll.

I agree to pay C. W. Carroll whatever said cattle sell for, over four cents, on my half interest.

L. J. Cusick.

The answer sets out the contract and contains averments that when the contract was made the cattle were in transit to the Chicago market; that they were sold for less than four cents per pound, and that the note in suit was given to said Cusick to make good to him the four cents per pound for the cattle under the contract, and that there was no other consideration for the note. A demurrer to the answer presents the question as to the validity of the contract. The district court sustained the demurrer, and from a judgment for plaintiff for the amount of the note the defendants appealed.

Messrs. Maxwell & Leonard, for appellants.

A wager or bet is a contract by which two or more parties agree that a certain sum of money, or other thing, shall be paid or delivered to one of them on the happening or not happening of an uncertain event.

The contract under consideration by its express terms is a wager on the prospective price of a commodity and falls clearly within the rule recognized in what might be termed option contract cases.

Messrs. McDill & Sullivan, for appellees:

This contract shows that for $30 paid him, Carroll guaranteed Cusick that his cattle then on the way to the market would bring him four cents per pound. This does not differ from an ordinary insurance contract against loss by fire.

Granger, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Counsel in argument agree that the question for determination is whether or not the contract set out in the answer is a wagering contract. If so, the note in suit, given as it was, in pursuance of the contract, is void under our holdings, even in the hands of the plaintiffs. Traders Bank v. Alsop, 64 Iowa, 97.

Appellant likens this contract, in its purpose and effect, to "option deals," which are held to be gambling contracts, and void. Appellee, however, urges, as a distinctive feature, that in option deals there is no actual property as a basis for the transaction, and no property is intended to be delivered or received, while in this case the cattle actually on the way to market formed the basis of the transaction, and it urges that by the contract the cattle were sold to Carroll, or, at least, an interest therein. We are unable to find any language in the contract evincing such a purpose. Cusick Bros. shipped the cattle. They are to sell the cattle in Chicago, and the contract in question is an executory one, to be performed after the cattle are sold. The transaction was clearly a speculative one as to prices. The disposition of the cattle is precisely what it would have been had the contract not been made. Cusick Bros. sold the cattle, as they intended to, for what they would bring in the market, and received the pay therefor; and this would have been the situation without the contract in question. The parties to the contract dealt alone with what would be the market price when the cattle should arrive in Chicago. The market price represented the actual value of the cattle. If the market price was above the four cents per pound, and Cusick paid the excess to Carroll, Carroll received something for nothing. If the market price was less, and Carroll paid to Cusick the difference, then Cusick received more than the value of his cattle, or, in other words, something for nothing, and such receipts are the inspiration and soul of gambling enterprises. Brue's App., 55 Pa. 294, gives the following definition: "Anything which induces men to risk their money or property without any other hope of return than to get for nothing any given amount from another, is gambling."

The same court, in the case of Wright v. Beck, 114 Pa. 422, 5 Cent. Rep. 536, used this language: "A transaction in stocks by way of margin, settlement of differences and payment of gain or loss, without intending to deliver stocks, is a mere wager."

This transaction was clearly one in which the parties intended to pay the gain or loss as a market price at a future time would require, without intending to deliver property, and under the rule given in the Pennsylvania case (55 Pa. 294), it was a wager. The mere fact that there was specific property about which the transaction occurred would make no difference. Parties may as effectually gamble with reference to actual property as with reference to the prices of different classes of property. The cases do not turn upon that point, but upon the actual intent of the parties. Tombia v. Callen, 69 Iowa, 229.

Appellee gives this illustration to show that Carroll had an interest in the cattle: "Suppose while in transit the cattle had been killed by the negligence of the railroad company, and the market price on the day they should have reached Chicago would have shown that the cattle would have brought five cents per pound, under Carroll's contract he would have been entitled to all the cattle would have brought over four cents per pound;" and follows with a conclusion that Carroll would have had a right of action against the railroad company. The greatest interest that could be claimed under such a state of facts would be an equitable lien for the profits resulting from the contract, and the mere fact that security is specifically given to aid a gambling contract does not make it valid. But we by no means concur in appellee's conclusion as to such an interest. As we have in substance said, the parties did not intend an exchange of the commodity between themselves, but they contracted only with reference to what Cusick Bros. would be able to sell the cattle for in the market on arrival. It was alone a question of gain or loss, depending on the correctness of their judgments as to future prices. Of course, in actual sales, a gain or loss is or may be the result of a correct or erroneous judgment; but the absence of a purpose to deal with actual property marks the distinction between a legal and a gambling contract. It will be observed that the contract specifies that, in consideration of $30 paid by Cusick, Carroll guaranteed that the cattle should sell for four cents per pound, and the validity of the contract is urged because of this payment and of the guaranty, and the case is likened to insurance. If the contract stopped with the guaranty, the case might be different, but the use of the word "guaranty," and the payment of the $30, do not devalue the transaction of its gambling characteristics or purpose. The word "guaranty" can have no other effect than an agreement to pay the difference, and the cash payment, while it might constitute a consideration for a valid agreement to make good a loss, will not cure or make valid what appears to be a mere chance speculation upon prices.

We think the District Court erred in sustaining the demurrer, and its judgment is reversed.

CROSS appeals from a decree of the District Court for Mahaska County in an action brought to enjoin defendant from interfering with the flow of water onto his lands from the adjoining lands of plaintiff, defendant appealing from so much of the decree as enjoined his interference with water flowing in one ditch, and plaintiff appealing from so much of the decree as refused to enjoin interference with water flowing in another ditch. Affirmed on defendant's appeal. Reversed on plaintiff's appeal.

Statement by Beek, J.:

Action in chancery to enjoin defendant from interfering with the flow of water from plaintiff's land upon the adjoining lands of defendant. There was a decree granting part of the relief prayed for by plaintiff, and refusing part. Both parties appeal,—the defendant first, and he is therefore designated as "appellant."

Land on a lower level owes a natural servitude to that on a higher level in respect of receiving, without claim for compensation by the owner, the water naturally flowing down to it. *Lord v. Every owner of land through which a stream of water flows has presumptively a right against owners of land below him to have the stream flow from his land, in its natural channel, unobstructed. The south ditch was not a watercourse but a mere wash upon defendant's land. It laid wholly upon defendant's land, and the surface water, after heavy rains, washed it into a crevice or steep slough such as is familiar to all residents of Iowa. To stop such washes, where they are small enough to be controlled, is the common effort of all good farmers, and it seems rather strange that the aid of a court of equity is invoked to prevent the defendant from using his land as good farmers ordinarily do. The right of defendant to thus protect his property is not defeated even although surface water may be impeded in its flow.

Browne, Fr. 2d ed. § 202.

Beck, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The petition is in two counts. The first alleges that plaintiff owns 160 acres of land, and defendant owns an eight-acre tract adjacent thereto, on the west; that for many years there has been upon plaintiff's land a natural drain, or open ditch, two or three feet deep, being a natural watercourse, which begins near the center of the tract, and runs in southwesterly direction, crossing the division line of defendant's land about twenty rods north of the southwest corner thereof, and thence across it; that this drain or watercourse is the natural outlet of the water falling and accumulating upon a part of plaintiff's land, and is the natural drainage thereof; that the defendant dammed up the drain at or near its entrance upon defendant's land, but the dam was washed out by the floods, and defendant threatens to rebuild it, and that the water arrested in its flow off of plaintiff's land, and caused to remain thereon by the dam, would prove to be a source of great injury thereto, which would prove irreparable if the dam be permitted to remain.

The second count alleges that plaintiff and defendant, at the time being owners of their respective tracts of land, entered into an oral agreement that plaintiff should cause an open ditch to be dug, other than the one referred to in the first count, which should run westerly from the southwest part of plaintiff's land, and cross the line of defendant's land about thirty rods south of the northeast corner thereof and should run thence upon defendant's land according to lines and distances set out in the petition, which need not be repeated here; that the parties should unite in constructing this ditch, each doing a part of the work, as stated in the petition; that each party was to have the right to connect the drains with the ditch, and that defendant threatens to destroy the ditch or drain and render it useless, which would work great injury to plaintiff.

The defendant, in answer to the first count of the petition, after denying, generally, all allegations thereof, admits the existence of the ditch described in the first count of the petition, but alleges that it is not a natural watercourse, but an artificial ditch. He admits that he obstructed the ditch, but denies that the flow of the water was thereby interfered with, and alleges that plaintiff's land, at the place in question, is higher than the defendant's land; that the ditch is not necessary for the proper drainage of plaintiff's land, the natural depression of the land being sufficient therefor; that it is his intention to fill up the ditch on his own land, but not to obstruct the flow of the water upon plaintiff's land, and that the ditch, with steep banks, is an injury to defendant's land.

In answer to the second count of the petition, defendant admits that the other ditch—the more northerly one—was dug at the mutual expense of the parties, pursuant to a verbal agreement made by the parties, which did not provide how long it should remain, but that it should be tiled in the future, if defendant so required, and that the ditch was not dug in compliance with the agreement. It is alleged that defendant now requires the ditch to be tiled, one half of the expense whereof he proposes to pay. Defendant, in a cross-petition, prays that plaintiff may be enjoined from collecting the water into the ditch described in the first count by tile drains, and thereby causing it to flow upon defendant's land. The cross-petition contains allegations in this language: "That defendant's land is lower than plaintiff's, and that the plaintiff's surface is drained naturally upon defendant's land, but that plaintiff has no lawful right, by drainage, to concentrate the under-ground water and to cause it to flow from a single point upon defendant's land, and that by so doing he has attempted to impose upon defendant's land a burden which it is not required by law to bear." The allegations of the cross petition are denied by plaintiff in a proper pleading.

Upon the final hearing on the merits, the court found the equities with defendant upon the first count of the petition, which was dismissed by the decree, and upon the second count the equities were found with plaintiff, and the relief prayed for thereon was granted. The defendant's cross-petition was dismissed.

2. The evidence and the pleading show that plaintiff's land is the higher, and is naturally drained over defendant's land by two "swales," as they are called in the pleadings ("swales" is a better designation), which run from or through plaintiff's land to and over defendant's. There is no other way of carrying the surplus water, caused by snow and rains, off of and away from plaintiff's land except through these swales. They also drain defendant's land, which has no other drainage. The case is not one of water, which would not naturally run upon defendant's land, being diverted and brought there by the unlawful acts of plaintiff, but is simply the case of the natural drainage of a tract of land through the swales prepared by nature for that very purpose. The two parties happen to own this tract of land; and the defendant, the owner of the servient estate, attempts to resist the undoubted right of plaintiff, the owner of the dominant estate, to have the surplus water falling upon his land conducted by nature's waterway off of his land to the brook, the creek and the river, the great natural drains of the county. The ground of this resistance is that this water from plaintiff's land passes over defendant's farm. But, as the water from defendant's land must pass over his neighbors' lands below him, which are servient to his lands, he is attempting to impose restrictions upon plaintiff which, with the same claim of right, could be imposed upon him, with equally disastrous results. It is insisted that plaintiff is violating the law and rights of defendant by collecting the water—"underground water," it is called in defendant's pleadings—by tiles, and conducting it to defendant's land at one place, which, it is claimed, is not permitted by the law. It will be readily seen, upon a moment's reflection, by one having but a limited acquaintance with the subject, upon the consideration of the facts developed in the evidence, that there is no difference between underground water, collected by tiling, and surface water. The first is water which would run off in a ditch, were one dug, without entering the earth. But it is permitted to enter the earth, and is then, by natural means, attracted and conducted to the tiles, and through them flows away. It must be remembered that the lands of both parties are used for cultivation with the plow.

The fact is known by every intelligent observer who has directed his eyes over the surface of our beautiful and fertile agricultural lands, that the swales are our most productive lands, while the sward of the prairie grass, and of other natural grasses, remains unbroken. There are no ditches or gutters in the swales. They, of course, are of various widths, depending largely upon the abruptness and height of the little hills or elevations of which they constitute the valleys. When the sward is broken by the plow, the water from rains and snows has a tendency to seek a channel down the swale, which will, of course, be no wider than is required to conduct away the surplus water falling on the land drained by the swale. This channel will soon become a ditch after the sward is broken; and, if left to nature, it will be sinuous, directed by the laws of nature, which give all watercourses that character. But the intelligent husbandman will aid water in this regard, and, with his plow or his shovel will keep the ditches straight. He will not act the foolish part of attempting to do that which is impossible, namely, to keep the surplus water flowing over all the surface of the swale; for the reason that it would prove impossible, and, if successful, it would cost him his crops, and finally impoverish his land, by causing the fertile soil to be washed away.

In the case before us, both parties, if they be intelligent farmers, do this very thing. Plaintiff, instead of an open ditch, put in tile, which subverts the same purpose. Now, these farmers are not diverting the water from the waterway provided by nature. They are not seeking to conduct the water contrary to the course of nature, or in a way it did not run before the soil became the property of man. When the use of the soil is changed from nature's husbandry, the production of grasses from meadows and pastures, to the cultivation of grain by means of the plow, nature continues to direct the water in channels. The plaintiff does not conduct the water to and upon defendant's land in a manner differing from that manner in which it was conducted before the land was plowed. The manner in each instance is nature's manner. Of course, the manner, in one instance, under the laws of nature, provides for a ditch; in the other instances, the laws of nature, under which was produced the sward of the prairie grass, dispenses with a ditch.

3. It is shown by the evidence—indeed, defendant himself so testifies—that the ditch referred to in the first count was made upon defendant's land, before he owned it, by the farmer who then owned and cultivated the land. It seems that the defendant's grantor, and the plaintiff or his grantor, were in accord in their views as to the ditch, and its course through the two tracts of land, and, either by express agreement or by mutual and silent acquiescence in the manner pursued by each in the improvement, by drains, of their respective lands, agreed upon the construction of the ditch, and the line it should pursue. Its place of crossing the dividing line of the lands, in this manner, was settled. The law will not permit complaint to be now made of the location and manner of construction of the ditch, after it has been acquiesced in by the parties. The right of the parties demands that the ditch should remain a settled matter. Good husbandry forbids the changing of ditches. Their permanence prevents the washing away of the soil, as well as avoids expenses in the change.

4. Upon the first count of the petition, and defendant's cross-petition, we reach the conclusions: (1) that the ditch is required by the best interest of both proprietors; (2) that the manner of its construction is in accord with the natural flow of the water; (3) that the quantity of the water has not been increased, and its flow has not been diverted, as charged; (4) that the ditch was established by the acquiescence of the proprietors, and that defendant threatens to interfere with, and change, the flow of the water, by building and maintaining a dam in the ditch; (5) that the ditch cannot be dispensed with, nor its course changed, without the consent of the parties interested. This conclusion is in accord with the doctrines of Livingston v. McDonald, 21 Iowa, 160, and is supported by familiar principles of the law. See Bratt v. Lamson, 2 Allen, 275.

5. The evidence very plainly leads to the conclusion of fact that the ditch described in the second count was constructed jointly by the parties, under an oral agreement as to its course, etc; each party contributing labor or money to constructing it. The parties have recognized the ditch, have plowed and farmed in accord with it, and have expended money and labor in the performance of the contract. It can be set aside, disregarded and annulled by neither without the consent of the other. The assent of defendant to the construction of the ditch on his land is in the nature of a license which, having been accepted and the rights conferred assumed and exercised, cannot be set aside or disregarded. Harkness v. Burton, 39 Iowa, 101; Cook v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 40 Iowa, 451; Anderson v. Simpson, 21 Iowa, 399; Beatty v. Gregory, 17 Iowa, 109.

6. These considerations lead us to the conclusion that the decree of the district court ought to be affirmed as to the second count, and as to the dismissal of defendant's cross-petition, and reversed as to the dismissal of the first count of the petition. A decree ought to have been entered granting the plaintiff all the relief prayed for in his petition, both upon the first and second counts, and dismissing the cross-petition of defendant. The cause will be remanded to the court below for such a decree.

Reversed on plaintiff's appeal.*

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

PALMER et al., Appts.,
v.
STATE OF TENNESSEE.

(....Tenn....)

1. Mere taxation of an unlawful business does not legalize it.
2. Selling pools on a horse-race run outside of the State is not licensed by the Act of 1889, placing a tax on the business of selling pools upon any such race "in this or any other State." That Act does not repeal Code, § 4370, which makes betting a misdemeanor, nor does it enlarge the exemption therefrom made by § 4371 of bets upon a horse-race run upon a licensed track within the State.

The power of taxation by any State is limited to persons, property or business within its jurisdiction. Tappan v. Merchants Nat. Bank, 36 U. S. 19 Wall. 480 (22 L. ed. 189); *Cleveland, P. & A. R. The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. S. Hill and J. M. Quarles for appellants.

Mr. G. W. Pickle, Atty-Gen., for the State.

Lurton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellants have been convicted of gambling. The indictment charged that they had bet, gambled and put to hazard upon a horse-race run upon a track not authorized by this State; and, in a second count, that they had encouraged and promoted gambling upon races upon mon; and hence the rule of equality is not violated by a taxation of these subjects by a rule which is uniform as to each class. Dia. Op. State Board of Assessors v. New Jersey Cent. R. Co. 4 Cent. Rep. 453, 48 N. J. L. 143.

Subjecting racing associations to taxation upon their receipts, and prescribing the period during which racing with horses shall be legal, and inferentially declaring at what time pools upon such races shall be sold, legalizes pool selling at the times and places mentioned. Brennan v. Brighton Beach Racing Assn. (Sup. Ct.) 30 N. Y. S. R. 406.

a track not licensed by this State. The case was tried without a jury upon an agreement as to the facts. The agreed state of facts is as follows:

(1) That the defendants did, on the 15th day of May, 1889, and before the presentment in this case was found, and within the City of Nashville, Davidson County, State of Tennessee, and within the jurisdiction of this court, both sell and offer to sell wagers or bets upon horse races to be run both in and out of the State of Tennessee, upon a race track other than the lawfully chartered or incorporated blood-horse or turf association, or trotting association, or stock or agricultural fair association.

(2) In this case there were four horses to be run in the race. The defendants offered to sell at public outcry the first choice for the winner in said race, when $50 was bid therefor by a by-stander, which, being the highest bid, was accepted, and the money paid over to the defendants, and thereupon the defendants offered the second choice on the horse to be run in said race, whereupon a by-stander bid $40, which bid, being the highest, was accepted, and the money paid over as before; and thereupon the defendants offered for sale in the same manner the third choice of the horses to be run in said race, whereupon a by-stander bid $30, which, being the highest bid, was accepted; and thereupon the defendant offered the remaining and unsold horse in the same manner, whereupon a by-stander bid $20, which, being the highest bid, was also accepted,—these several sums making altogether the gross sum of $140, from which gross sum the defendants deducted 5 per cent, or $7, as their compensation for their services, leaving remaining, net, $133. On the succeeding day the horse-race was run, and the party who had purchased, in the manner heretofore stated, the horse that won, or came out ahead, in the race, was entitled to and did receive from the defendants the whole sum of $133, which was accordingly paid over to said party. The defendants kept books or memoranda of each bid made and accepted, as heretofore stated. These transactions heretofore related all occurred in a room called a "pool-room," or place for selling pools on horse-races. This particular race was run upon a track outside of the State of Tennessee, but in the State of Kentucky, and within the six months next preceding the presentment in this case. This is known as "auction pools."

(3) It is further agreed and admitted that the defendants, at the time of the selling of said pools as stated in paragraph 2, had duly paid to the county court clerk of Davidson County the privilege tax of $500 imposed upon pool-selling by an Act of the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, entitled "An Act to Provide Revenue for the State of Tennessee, and the Counties thereof," approved April 8, 1889. And that the said clerk of the County Court of Davidson County had, in consideration of the payment of said privilege tax, duly issued and delivered to the defendant a license, as provided in said Act of the General Assembly, for pool-selling, and that said license was in full force and effect prior to the 15th day of May, 1890, and on said day, and continuing until that date.

The question for decision is as to the effect of the alleged license in legalizing the sale on pools upon races run outside of the State.

By section 4870 of the Code of Tennessee, it is made a misdemeanor to "make any bet or wager for money or other valuable thing."

By section 4861, horse-racing "upon a track or path kept for that purpose" is exempt from the provisions of the Statute against gaming. The betting of money upon a horse race upon a track within the State, not licensed by the State, has been held to be gambling, within section 4870. Huff v. State, 2 Swan, 379.

The Act legalizing racing upon a licensed track has been held to have been intended to encourage the improvement of domestic stock, and not intended to make gaming lawful upon races run outside of the State, and that betting upon races run in another State was a misdemeanor, under section 4870. Edwards v. State, 8 Lea, 412; Daly v. State, 12 Lea, 228; State v. Blackburn, 3 Coldw. 205.

By the Revenue Act of 1885, a tax of $2000 was put upon the occupation of pool-selling. Acts 1885, Extra Sess. p. 42.

By the Assessment Act of 1887, the occupation of pool-selling was declared to be a privilege, and not to be pursued without license. Act 1887, p. 48.

By the Revenue Act of the same year, a tax was placed upon this business. Act 1887, p. 17.

By the Assessment Act of 1889 § 52, the avocation of pool-selling is again declared a privilege, and, as such, not to be pursued without license. Act 1889, p. 168.

By the Revenue Act of same year, a tax is placed upon each person, company or corporation or agent engaged in selling pools upon any running, trotting or pacing race in this or any other State. Acts 1889, p. 200.

If the selling of pools be not a lottery,—a question not here decided, for reasons hereafter noticed,—then the sale of pools upon races to be run upon a track licensed by this State would not be gaming, within our Statute. Daly v. State, supra.

It was, however, within the power of the Legislature to make the business of selling pools a privilege, and to assess upon the privilege such tax as was deemed wise. Both of the Acts erecting pool-selling into a privilege—that of 1887, and that of 1889—designate the business as "pool-selling," without further words describing the limits of the business. To make this business, by its general designation, a privilege, would no more authorize a seller to sell pools upon an unlawful race than does the liquor dealer's license authorize him to sell liquor to minors, or on Sunday, or within four miles of a school-house.

The privilege of "selling pools," which is not to be pursued without a license, is limited to the sale of lawful pools; that is, pools which are in substance bet upon races to be run upon a licensed track or turf within this State. The tax assessed upon the privilege by the Acts of 1885 and 1887 was assessed upon pool-selling, no effort being made to designate whether upon races in or out of the State. The change made in the assessment of the tax upon this occupation by the Act of 1889 is made by adding the words, "in this State, or any other State." The contention is that the addition of these words, not in the Act creating the privilege, but in an Act simply fixing the tax upon a privilege created by another and different Act, operates to license the sale of pools upon races run upon unlicensed tracks in this State, and upon all tracks in other States, and that the licensing of an act theretofore criminal operates to make the act legal, and entitles it to the protection of the law. To put this construction upon this clause in a Revenue Act would operate to repeal in part the criminal law of the State, and to make lawful a species of gambling which has been heretofore unlawful. Was it the intent of the Legislature, by words added to the language theretofore used in fixing the amount of tax upon the occupation of pool-selling, to enlarge the privilege of selling pools beyond such pools as were sold upon lawful races? Or was it the intent of the law makers, by the levying of this tax, to create the privilege of selling pools upon races to be run outside of the State? If the Act which enumerated and created privileged occupations had in express words authorized the licensing of the business of selling pools upon races run in other States, we should then have had a very different question to deal with, for in that case there would be no doubt that the intent of the legislation was to make that species of business a privilege. The effect of such legislation in an Amendment Act, in repealing the Statute making such pool-selling criminal, would present a very grave question. But the question we have to deal with here is as to whether the Legislature intended, by the words they have used in describing this business, to authorize or license the sale of pools upon illegal races.

The case of Dun v. O'Fallen, 18 Lea, 202, is cited by the learned counsel as settling this question of legislative intent. That case was this: The business of commercial agencies was not made a privilege in the Act creating and enumerating privileged avocations. In the Revenue Bill, a tax was levied upon the occupation. The court were agreed that the language of the Revenue Act, namely, "that the rate of taxation on the following privileges shall be as follows," naming the avocations, and the rates of tax would ordinarily be sufficient to create a privilege, and forbid its exercise without license. The "difficulty," said Judge Cooper, speaking for the court, "grows out of the fact that the Legislature has passed two Acts,—one of them apparently intended, among other things, to designate the taxable privileges, and the other to fix the rate of taxation upon privileges; and the doubt is whether the latter Act was actually intended to create a privilege."

"The point," said he, "is one of some nicety." He reaches a conclusion of this question by the suggestion that this business of a commercial agency was "mentioned, unquestionably, with the expectation that [it was] to be taxed; and, if the Legislature have used language sufficient to enable us to carry that intent into effect, it would seem to be our duty to effectuate the intent. We think this the better conclusion, and hold the occupation taxable." 18 Lea, 205.

The sole inquiry in that case was as to whether or the intent of the Legislature was to make that occupation taxable; and the duty of the court was to carry out that intent, if made sufficiently plain. There the question of "nicety" is not as to whether the Legislature intended to create pool-selling a privilege. That they have done in express words. But did they intend, by the words used in describing a privilege created by another Act, to enlarge it so as to make legal that which by the general law was criminal, or to create a new and different privilege from the one created by the Act enumerating taxable privileges? This case is distinguishable from that in many obvious particulars.

Neither is the case of State v. Dunora, reported in 16 Lea, at page 81, a controlling case. By an Act approved March 30, 1883, it was made a misdemeanor to buy or sell futures. By the Amendment Act approved on the same day, the business of selling futures was made a privilege, and a tax assessed by the Revenue Act thereon. The two Acts then passed together were for this reason construed together, for the purpose of arriving at the meaning and intent of each. "The effect of the Acts of 1883, taken together," said Judge Cooper, "is to make it a misdemeanor, both to the buyer and seller, to deal in futures without a license, and at the same time legalize the dealing, by taking out a license." 16 Lea, 81.

We have no such case here. By very ancient statute law, betting upon races other than such as were run on licensed tracks was a misdemeanor. This exception in favor of domestic races was, in its evil results, comparatively limited. To extend this exemption to races run everywhere is, as we can very well know from our knowledge of affairs, to open the doors of gambling establishments all the year round. Did the Legislature intend, by the Revenue Act of 1889, to repeal the general and ancient laws of the State, which made such betting criminal? It is not the case of two Acts upon the same subject, passed upon the same day; and the rule of construction applicable in the Dunora case has no application here.

The tax upon the business of selling pools upon races to be run upon licensed tracks with in this State is a tax upon a lawful business, if it be not a lottery,—a question which we do not decide, for the reason that a majority of the court are of the opinion that, for the reasons stated, the provisions concerning the sale of pools upon races run outside of the State is ineffectual, whether it did or did not attempt to license a lottery, as it did not in fact license pool-selling on races run outside of the State—but, so far as it seems to be a tax upon the selling of pools upon races not so run, it is at most a tax assessed upon an unlawful occupation. Taxation so imposed will not be construed to operate as a license legalizing such unlawful betting. Taxation, even under the form of a privilege tax, does not necessarily operate to license the business. The Constitution of Michigan prohibited the passing of any law licensing liquor dealers. A specific tax was assessed upon liquor dealers. It was held by the Supreme Court of that State, Judge Cooley delivering the opinion, not to be, in its legal effect, a license tax, or in any way to sanction, authorize or countenance the business. "The idea," said Judge Cooley, "that the State lends its countenance to any particular traffic by taxing it, seems to us to rest upon a very transparent fallacy. It certainly overlooks or disregards some ideas that must always underlie taxation. Taxes are not favors, they are burdens. They are necessary, it is true, to the existence of government; but they are not the less burdens. . . . It would be a remarkable proposition, under such circumstances, that a thing is sanctioned and countenanced by the government, when this burden, which may prove disastrous, is imposed upon it, while, on the other hand, it is frowned upon and condemned when the burden is withheld. . . . The taxation of a thing may be, and often is, when police purposes are had in view, a means of expressing disapproval, instead of approbation. . . . A business may be licensed, and yet not taxed; or it may be taxed, and yet not licensed. And, so far as the tax from being necessarily a license, that provision is frequently made by law for the taxation of a business that is carried on under a license existing independent of the tax." He concludes a most elaborate discussion by saying: "If one puts the government to special inconvenience and cost by keeping up a prohibited traffic, or maintaining a nuisance, the fact is a reason for discriminating in taxation against him; and, if the tax is imposed on the thing which is prohibited, or which constitutes the nuisance, the Tax Law, instead of being inconsistent with the law declaring the illegality, is in entire harmony with its general purpose, and may sometimes be even more effectual. Certainly, whatever discriminations are made in taxation ought to be in the direction of making the heaviest burdens fall upon those things which are obnoxious to the public interest, wherever that is practicable." Youngblood v. Sexton, 82 Mich. 406.

An instance of a license which does not carry with it protection is that of the federal tax upon the occupation of liquor dealing, in States or localities where such traffic is illegal. Licenses Tax Cases, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 462 [18 L. ed. 497]. Concerning this class of cases, it is said: "These burdens are imposed in the form of what are called 'license fees;' and it has been claimed that, where the party paid the fee, he was thereby licensed to carry on the business, despite the regulation which the state government might make upon the subject. This view, however, has not been taken by the courts, who have regarded the congressional legislation imposing a license fee as only a species of taxation, without the payment of which the business could not be carried on, but which, nevertheless, did not propose to make any business lawful which was not lawful before, or to relieve it from any burden or restrictions imposed by the regulations of the State." Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th ed. 721.

The tax imposed by the Act of 1889 is, so far as it is imposed upon the illegal business of selling pools upon races run upon unlicensed tracks, not operative as a license, and does not, by necessary implication, repeal the Criminal Law affecting such betting. The defendants could not, therefore, interpose their receipt for this tax as a defense to the criminal charge.

The judgment must be affirmed.

NOTE.—Taxes must be laid for public purposes, and not for private interests.

Held, further, that the Act is not an infringement of section 185 of the State Constitution, in this: that it is a measure intended for the "necessary support of the poor."

the writs of habeas corpus, mandamus, certiorari and injunction only when applied for as prerogative writs; and where the question presented is publici juris, and one affecting the sovereignty of the State, its franchises or prerogatives or the liberties of the people. To invoke the original jurisdiction of this court, the interest of the State must be primary and proximate, and not secondary and remote. This court will judge for itself whether the wrong complained of is one which requires the interposition of this court to protect the prerogatives and franchises of the State in its sovereign character. In all cases where the original jurisdiction of this court is invoked, except in habeas corpus cases, the attorney-general shall proceed only on leave, based upon a prima facie showing that the case is one of which it is proper for this court to take cognizance. In ordinary cases, this court will not exercise its original jurisdiction to restrain local taxation for any reason. The proper jurisdiction for that purpose is lodged in the district courts. Held, this being an application made by the attorney-general in behalf of the State to enjoin the issue of bonds upon the alleged ground that the Statute authorizing the bonds is unconstitutional, that the question is one of local concern, and affects only the County of Nelson and its taxpayers, and hence the case does not fall within the limited class of cases in which this court will exercise original jurisdiction. Held, that the writ of injunction is denied upon the ground that the Statute in question is a valid law, and also upon the ground that the question presented is one of merely local concern, and hence is not a proper case to call for the issuing of a writ out of this court.

1897) and entitled "An Act Authorizing Counties to Issue Bonds to Procure Seed-grain for Needy Farmers Resident therein." The information is based upon the complaint of one John Birkholz, which alleges: "First. That the above named complainant, John Birkholz, is a taxpayer of the County of Nelson, the respondent above named. Second. That said respondent is a political or public corporation, duly organized under existing laws. Third. That J. W. Forbes is the duly elected and qualified chairman of the board of county commissioners, and N. F. Webb is the duly elected county auditor of Nelson County, and as such officers are respectively discharging the duties thereof. Fourth. That the above named respondent, on the 20th day of March, 1899, acting through its board of county commissioners and the county auditor of said County, pursuant to a petition signed by 100 freeholders resident in said County, adopted and passed a resolution at a meeting of said board, and thereby resolved to issue the bonds of the said County to the sum of twenty thousand dollars ($20,000), payable in ten (10) years, and bearing interest at the rate of seven (7) per cent per annum, payable semi-annually, claiming their right to so do under an Act of the Legislative Assembly entitled 'An Act Authorizing Counties to Issue Bonds to Procure Seed-grain for Needy Farmers Resident therein,' approved February 14, 1899, and Acts amendatory thereto; that in pursuance to said resolution said respondent, acting through its auditor and the chairman of its board of county commissioners, has taken such steps as are requisite and necessary in the premises to and is about to issue bonds for said amount, in pursuance of said resolution, claiming its right to do so under the Act aforesaid. Fifth. That if said bonds are issued they will become the obligation of the County. In order to meet the payment of the interest thereon, and the payment of the principal of the same, it will be necessary to levy taxes from year to year against the tax paying people of said County, and the proceeds of said bonds, when issued and sold by the said County, will be diverted to and used for the purpose of buying seed grain, to be distributed to private individuals, indigent and poor farmers, resident in said County. Sixth. That the Act of the Legislative Assembly aforesaid, under which said respondent claims its right to issue said bonds, is in contravention of section 185 of the Constitution of the State of North Dakota, which said section reads as follows: 'Sec. 185. Neither the State, nor any county, city, township, town, school-district or any other political subdivision, shall loan or give its credit, or make donations to or in aid of any individual, association or corporation, except for necessary support of the poor, nor subscribe to or become the owner of the capital stock of any association or corporation, nor shall the State engage in work of internal improvement, unless authorized by a two-thirds vote of the people.' Wherefore your complainants pray your honorable court that an order in the nature of a rule to show cause be issued to the said respondent, its officers, agents and servants, to be and appear before your honors at Fargo, in the County of Cass and State of North Dakota, at 9 L. R. A.

the opening of court thereof on Wednesday the 2d day of April, A. D. 1899, and then and there show cause, if any reason it has, why an injunction should not be issued restraining respondent from issuing the bonds aforesaid."

It clearly appears from the complaint that the County of Nelson has, under the provisions of the Seed-grain Act in question, taken all of the requisite preliminary steps, and is about to issue the bonds of the County, and sell the same; and will apply the proceeds of such sale to the purchase of seed grain for such farmers of that County as come within the terms of the Seed-grain Law, and who make application for the seed grain under oath, and in manner and form as prescribed by the law. It is conceded that all action taken by the defendants is warranted by the express terms of the law; nor is it pretended that the bonds, if issued, will create a county indebtedness exceeding in amount the limit presented by the Constitution of the State. Under such circumstances, the writ of injunction will be refused, as a matter of course, unless the Statute under which the bonds are intended to be issued is itself unconstitutional or void for some reason. The question presented must turn upon the validity of the Seed-grain Statute.

The Statute has 30 sections, but it will suffice to give the substance of such of its provisions as bear upon its validity as a law.

Section 1 provides as follows: "In any county of the State where the crops for any preceding year have been a total or partial failure by reason of drought, hail or other cause, it shall be lawful for the board of county commissioners of such county to issue the bonds of the county under and pursuant to the provisions of this Act, and, with the proceeds derived from the sale thereof, to purchase seed-grain for the inhabitants thereof who are in need of seed grain, and who are unable to procure the same, whenever said board shall be petitioned in writing so to do by not less than 100 freeholders resident in the county; and said board, at a meeting called as hereinafter provided, to consider said petition, shall by a majority vote determine that the prayer of the petitioners shall be granted: provided that all such petitions shall be filed with the county auditor or county clerk on or before the 28th day of February, and thereupon it shall be the duty of said officer to forthwith call a meeting of the board of county commissioners of his county to consider said petition; and provided, further, that the total amount of bonds issued by any county under the provisions of this Act shall not, with the then existing indebtedness of the county, exceed the limit of indebtedness fixed by the Constitution in such case."

Section 4 provides: "The proceeds arising from the sale of said bonds shall be paid by the purchaser thereof to the county treasurer of the county, or to his authorized agent at the time of the delivery thereof, and such proceeds shall be paid out only on the order of the board of county commissioners."

Section 6 provides that, "for the purpose of securing prompt payment of the principal and interest of said bonds, there shall be levied by the board of county commissioners, at the time and in the manner that other taxes are levied, such sums as shall be sufficient to pay such interest and in addition thereto a sinking-fund tax shall be annually levied sufficient to pay and retire said bonds at their maturity, and it shall be the duty of the county treasurer to pay promptly the interest upon said bonds as the same shall fall due. No tax or fund provided for the payment of such bonds, either principal or interest, shall at any time be used for any other purpose."

Section 7 is as follows: "The fund arising from the sale of said bonds shall be applied exclusively by said board for the purchase of seed grain for residents of the county who are poor and unable to procure the same; provided, that no more than 150 bushels of wheat, or its equivalent in any grain, shall be furnished to any one person."

Section 8 provides that "all persons entitled to or wishing to avail themselves of the benefit of this Act shall file with the county auditor or county clerk of the county where said applicant resides, on or before the 1st day of March, an application duly sworn to before said county auditor or clerk, or some other officer authorized to administer oaths. Said application shall contain a true statement of the number of acres the applicant has plowed or prepared for seeding; how many acres the applicant intends to have plowed and prepared for seeding; how many bushels and what kind of grain he will require to seed the ground so prepared as aforesaid; how many bushels of grain the applicant harvested in the preceding year; that the applicant has not procured, and is not able to procure, the necessary seed-grain for the current year, that he desires the same for seed, and no other purpose, and that he will not sell or dispose of the same, or any part thereof, but will use the same, and the whole thereof, in seeding the land so prepared, or to be prepared for crop."

Section 9 provides that the commissioners shall examine all applications, and determine "who are entitled to the benefits thereof, and the amount to which each applicant is entitled."

Section 10 provides that the applicants under the Act shall, before receiving the seed grain, sign a "contract in duplicate, attested by the county auditor or county clerk, to the effect that said applicant, for and in consideration of ——— bushels of seed-grain received from ——— county, promises to pay to said county ——— dollars, the amount of the cost of the seed-grain; that said sum shall be taxable against all the real and personal property of said applicant; that such tax shall be levied by the county auditor or county clerk of his county, and collected as other taxes are collected under the laws of this State; that the amount of such indebtedness shall become due and payable on the 1st day of October, in the year in which said seed-grain is furnished, together with the interest on such amount from the 1st day of April of that year, at the rate of seven per cent per annum; and, if said indebtedness be not paid on or before the 30th day of October of that year, it shall then be the duty of the county auditor or county clerk of the said county to cause the amount of said indebtedness to be entered upon the tax-list of said county for that year as a tax on the land on which said seed-wheat was sown, and upon any other land owned by the applicant, to be collected as other taxes are; and the sum so entered and levied shall be a lien upon the real estate owned by such person until said indebtedness is fully paid, when it shall be the duty of the proper officer to cancel the same."

The objects and purposes contemplated by the Statute may be readily gathered from the above extracts, and they are clear and unmistakable in their character. The Legislature by this enactment, so far as it can do so, has clothed the several counties of the State where there has been a preceding crop failure with authority to lend their aid in procuring seed-grain to such of their citizens as are engaged in farming pursuits, who make it appear, in manner and form as detailed by the law, that they are unable to procure such seed grain by any other means. The law empowers the counties to lend their aid out of money to be obtained by the issue and sale of county bonds, such bonds to be paid, principal and interest, from funds obtained by means of a general tax levy upon all of the taxable property situated within the counties that issue such bonds. Two features of this Statute stand out in conspicuous prominence: First, All benefits obtainable under the Act are confined to persons engaged in the pursuit of farming, and among farmers only those who propose to continue the business of farming after the aid in contemplation has been received by them. Second, No part of the fund is intended to be used in support or aiding such indigent persons as have already become a county charge, viz., paupers.

The objections which may be made to the validity of this Statute are twofold: First, it may be claimed that the tax authorized by the Statute is not for a public purpose, hence not a valid tax; second, it may be contended that, under section 186 of the State Constitution, counties are expressly forbidden to make donations, or lend their aid to either corporations or individuals, hence that the proposed aid is unconstitutional, as repugnant to said section. The courts of this country, and of all countries where constitutional liberty exists, agree with the elementary writers upon the science of government that it is essential to the validity of a tax that it be laid for a public purpose. Difficulty has frequently arisen in discriminating between public and private objects, but where the object is primarily to foster private enterprises, and the only benefit to be derived by the public is incidental and secondary, the tax will be annulled by the courts as an abuse of the legislative prerogative. In the first instance the duty devolves upon the legislative branch of the government to determine whether a proposed tax is or is not for a public purpose and courts are loth to interpose and declare any tax unlawful, and will only do so in case of a palpable disregard of the wise limitations, express and implied, restricting the power of taxation. But where the Legislature assumes, in the guise of taxation, to compel A to advance his private means to aid B in the prosecution of a purely private enterprise, the courts will not hesitate to perform the duty of declaring such tax void, as subversive of fundamental and vested individual rights, and will do so even in cases where there is no express constitutional inhibition. The power of confiscation does not exist in the Legislature. The cases cited below are but a few of the numerous cases which have applied these principles to statutes imposing pretended taxes. Osborne & L. Assn. v. Topaka, 87 U. S. 30 Wall. 656 [20 L. ed. 455]; Commercial Nat. Bank v. Iola, 9 Dill. 353; Purkessbury v. Brown, 100 U. S. 487 [27 L. ed. 393]; Cole v. La Grange, 110 U. S. 1 [26 L. ed. 606]; Allen v. Jay, 60 Me. 124; Lowell v. Boston, 111 Mass. 454; State v. Osceola Twp. 14 Kan. 422; Costas v. Campbell, 87 Minn. 409; Cooley, Const. Lim. marg. p. 407; Cooley, Taxn. 2d ed. pp. 55, 120.

Under these authorities, the test to be applied to the Seed grain Statute is this: Is the tax provided for in the Statute laid for a public purpose? If this question is answered in the negative, the Statute must be declared null and void, without reference to section 163 of the State Constitution, to which the attention of the court has been particularly directed. The Statute makes provision for levying a general tax, in counties issuing the bonds, for the benefit of a numerous body of citizens, who without fault of theirs, and solely by reason of successive crop failures, are now reduced to extremities, and are in fact impoverished to such an extent that they are, for the present time, wholly without the ability to obtain the grain necessary for seeding the lands from which they derive the necessities of life. It is agreed on all sides that this class of citizens, having already exhausted their private credit, must have friendly aid from some source in procuring seed grain, if they put in crops this year. The Legislature, by this Statute, has devised a measure which seems well adapted to meet the exigency, and promises to give the needed relief, with little prospect of ultimate loss to the county treasurer. It is reasonable to anticipate that the beneficiaries of the Act will be enabled to tide over their present embarrassments, and, through the aid granted them by this Statute, a wide-spread calamity, both public and private, will be averted. The crisis in the development of the State which renders some measure of wholesale relief imperatively necessary is fully recognized by all well-informed citizens of the State, and this court will be justified in taking judicial notice of the existing status. The stubborn fact exists that a class of citizens, numbered by many thousands, is in such present straits, from poverty, that unless succored by some comprehensive measure of relief they will become a public burden, in other words, paupers, dependent upon counties where they reside for support. It is to avert such a wide-spread disaster that the Seed grain Statute was enacted, and it should be interpreted in the light of the public danger which was the occasion of its passage.

"The support of paupers, and the giving of assistance to those who, by reason of age, infirmity or disability are likely to become such, is, by the practice and the common consent of civilized countries, a public purpose." Cooley, Taxn. 2d ed. pp. 124, 125.

"The relief of the poor—the care of those who are unable to care for themselves—is among the unquestioned objects of public duty."

Opinion of Brewer, J., in State v. Osceola Twp. 14 Kan. 424.

If the destitute farmers of the frontier of North Dakota were now actually in the almshouses of the various counties in which they reside, all the adjudications of the courts, state and federal, upon this subject, could be marshaled as precedents in support of any taxation, however onerous, which might become necessary for their support. But is it not competent for the Legislature, representing the taxpayers, in the exercise of its discretion and within the limits of county indebtedness prescribed by the State Constitution, to clothe county commissioners with authority, to be exercised at their discretion, to make small loans, secured by prospective crops, to those whose condition is so impoverished and desperate as to reasonably justify the fear that, unless they receive help, they and their families will become a charge upon the counties in which they live.

We have carefully examined the authorities above cited, and many others of similar import, and while fully assenting to the principles enunciated by the cases, viz., that all taxation must be for a public purpose, we do not, with the single exception of the Kansas case, regard them as parallel cases, and applicable to the question presented in the case at bar. As we view the matter, the tax in question is for a public purpose, i. e., a tax for the "necessary support of the poor."

The case of State v. Osceola Twp., supra, asserts a doctrine which would defeat the tax in question. This court has great respect for the court which promulgated that decision, and the most sincere admiration for the distinguished jurist, now upon the supreme bench of the nation, who wrote the opinion in that case. Nevertheless we cannot yield our assent to the reasoning of the case, leading to the conclusion that a loan of aid to an impoverished class, not yet in the poor-house, is necessarily a tax for a private purpose. In our view, it is not certain, or even probable, in the light of subsequent experience in the west, that the court of last resort in the State of Kansas would enunciate the doctrine of that case at the present day. The decision was made fifteen years ago. While the fundamental principles which underlie legislation and taxation have not changed in the interval, it is also true that the development of the Western States has been attended with difficulties and adverse conditions which have made it necessary to broaden the application of fundamental principles to meet the new necessities of those States. Under the stress of adversity peculiar to the condition of the frontier farmer, there has come to be an expansion of the legal meaning of the term "poor" sufficient to embrace a class of destitute citizens who have not yet become a public charge. The main features of the Seed-grain Statute are neither new nor novel. It was borrowed from territorial legislation, and long prior to that the State of Minnesota, in aid of agricultural settlers upon its western frontier, enacted a series of statutes which are open to every criticism which can be made upon the Statute under consideration. Dak. Laws 1889, chap. 40. See also Minn. Gen. Stat. 1878, pp. 1024-1030.

The Legislature of Minnesota has frequently, and by a variety of laws, extended aid to the frontier farmers of that State, who, far from being paupers, were yet reduced to extremities by reason of continued crop failures resulting from hailstorms, successive seasons of drought, and from the ravages of grasshoppers. Under one law towns are authorized to vote a tax to defray the expense of destroying grasshoppers; under another statute, the governor, state auditor and state treasurer were authorized to borrow $100,000 on state bonds, to be issued by them, and the proceeds were to be expended in the purchase of seed-grain for the needy farmers. Again, and at the same session, the same state officials were empowered to issue additional bonds to the same amount, to pay a debt contracted for a similar purpose, upon warrants of the state auditor. Section 6 of the Minnesota Act of 1878, chap. 90, provides as follows: "The credit of the State is hereby pledged to the payment of the interest and principal of the bonds mentioned in this Act, as the same may become due." By another section the state auditor is authorized and required to levy an annual tax necessary to meet the interest and principal of the debt created by these bonds. Many of the features of the two Seed-grain Statutes passed at the first session of the Legislature of this State are borrowed from Minnesota. In principle, the legislation of the two States is identical. The aid extended is furnished in the form of a loan to individual farmers, secured on their crops, but to be met primarily by taxation. The destitute communities of farmers who were thus assisted in a neighboring State were enabled thereby to tide over their temporary necessities, and are now self-supporting.

This review of legislation in aid of destitute farmers will serve to illustrate the well known fact that legislation under the pressure of a public sentiment, born of stern necessity, will adapt itself to new exigencies, even if in doing so a sanction is given to a broader application of elementary principles of government than have before been recognized and applied by the courts in adjudicated cases. It is the boast of the common law that it is elastic, and can be adjusted to the development of new social and business conditions. Can a statute enacted for such broadly humane and charitable purposes be annulled by another branch of the government as an abuse of legislative discretion? We think otherwise. Great deference is due from the courts to the legislative branch of the state government, and it is axiomatic that in cases of doubt the courts will never interfere to annul a statute. Cooley, Const. Lim. marg. p. 487.

It will be presumed that the Legislature, in passing the Seed-grain Statute, acted upon the fullest knowledge of the necessities of the situation, and also presumed that they have passed the Statute after due deliberation and with the clearest apprehension of the scope and purpose of the language used in section 185 of the State Constitution. That section is not only restrictive upon counties, but is also permissive. It permits counties to lend aid for "the necessary support of the poor." To our mind, the restrictive words of that section were intended to prevent the loan of aid either to individuals or corporations, for the purpose of fostering business enterprises, either of a public or private nature; but that the people who adopted the Constitution, as well as those who framed the instrument, expressly intended by the language of that section to grant a power affirmatively to the municipal corporations named in section 185, to lend their aid and make donations for the "necessary support of the poor." The attention of the court has been directed to the Constitutions of nineteen of the States, in which the language of section 185 is used verbatim, except only that in the States of North and South Dakota the words above quoted are interpolated. Why was this peculiar language introduced into the Constitutions of North and South Dakota, when nothing of the kind was found in that of the other seventeen States? Why did not the conventions which formed the Organic Law for North and South Dakota simply copy the language which, with this exception, is borrowed from the other Constitutions, without inserting the excepting clause under consideration? To our mind, the answer to these questions is found in the peculiar and alarming condition of the people of Dakota Territory in the year 1889, when the two Dakotas assumed the responsibilities of statehood. Such conditions had not before existed, and hence the Constitutions of other States had made no provisions to meet such necessities. When the two States formed and adopted their Constitutions the fact was well known and recognized by the people of Dakota that the condition of many farming communities was such that some comprehensive measure for their relief was an imperative necessity. In such a conjuncture the words were interpolated into section 185 of the Constitution, which permit counties to loan their aid for the "necessary support of the poor." No constitutional grant of power was necessary to give the new governments authority to provide for the support of paupers in the poor houses. That power is inherent, and exists in all governments as among their implied powers and duties. By universal consent, taxes are valid when laid for the support of paupers, or those likely to become paupers. There was no necessity and no reason for inserting a provision in the State Constitutions of North and South Dakota authorizing counties to loan their aid to maintain the almshouses. It would be absurd to assume that the framers of the Constitutions and the people who adopted them intended by this provision to enable local municipalities to issue and sell bonds, and loan the proceeds to the inmates of the poor houses; yet the power to loan aid in "support of the poor" is given. In our opinion, this power is conferred in the Organic Law expressly to meet the exigencies of the situation then existing, and that it is our duty to give it that effect. We believe, and so hold, that the clause referred to in the exception contained in section 185 of the State Constitution is the poor and destitute farmers of the State, and that the first Legislature which met after the State was admitted has, by the Seed-grain Statute, put a proper construction upon the language in question. We therefore refuse to grant the writ applied for, and hold that the Seed-grain Statute is a valid enactment.

But our refusal to issue the writ can be placed upon still another ground. This case furnishes the first instance of an application to this court to put forth its original jurisdiction by issuing a writ except in a single habeas corpus case. We deem it expedient, therefore, to now indicate briefly the circumstances under which this court, in the exercise of a discretion vested in it, will deem it its duty to take original cognizance of cases. Section 86 of the Constitution of the State authorizes this court to "issue writs of habeas corpus, mandamus, quo warranto, certiorari and injunction." In the exercise of its appellate and supervisory powers over inferior courts the supreme court may have occasion from time to time to issue certain of the writs above enumerated; but such writs will not issue out of this court, in the exercise of its original jurisdiction, except in a limited class of cases, and such as are not ordinarily of frequent occurrence. All of the original and remedial writs which can be issued out of this court, under the Constitution, may, under section 103 of the State Constitution, be issued, not only by the district courts, but the judges thereof. We think the intention was to devolve upon the district courts, which are readily accessible, and at all times open for public business, the duty of assuming original cognizance of all ordinary cases which are remediable by means of the writs aforesaid; and to confer upon the supreme court, in the exercise of a discretion vested in it, the duty of taking original cognizance only in the limited class of cases where the writs, except the writ of habeas corpus, are sought for on motion of the attorney-general as prerogative writs. Except in cases of habeas corpus, leave to file an information must be obtained by the attorney-general. When the information makes out a prima facie case, the writ will issue only in cases publici juris and those affecting the sovereignty of the State, its franchises and prerogatives, or the liberties of its people. In such cases the court will judge for itself whether the wrong complained of is one which demands the interposition of this court. The Constitution of this State, with respect to the original jurisdiction of the supreme court, is substantially the same as that of the State of Wisconsin; and the interpretation given by the supreme court of that State to that part of its State Constitution meets with the full approval of this court. See Atty-Gen. v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 85 Wis. 425; Atty-Gen. v. Eau Claire, 87 Wis. 400; Wheeler v. Northern Colorado Irrigation Co. 9 Colo. 248.

The case at bar affects only the local concerns of the County of Nelson and its taxpayers, and hence does not fall within the limited class of cases indicated above, and in which alone this court will assume original jurisdiction. It follows that for this reason, also, the writ must be denied.

All concur.

Mr. E. S. Sampson for John Beinke, defendant:

Robinson, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

The title of the land in question was considered and determined in Kellmer v. Wuchner, 74 Iowa, 360.

This action was brought for a partition of the land. Plaintiff asks that, in determining the respective interests of the parties to this action, the improvements upon the land be considered, and that an allowance therefor be duly made. Before this action was commenced plaintiff sold, and agreed in writing to convey, the premises in controversy to John Beinke, and he is made a party defendant. The appellants ask for the partition of the real estate, but insist that their interest is not affected by the improvements. The defendant Beinke admits the contract of purchase with plaintiff, and avers that it is an entirety, and that he does not desire to take only a part of the land. He also alleges that he has placed thereon improvements to the value of $675, and asks that in case a sale is ordered the plaintiff's share of the proceeds thereof be paid into court until an adjustment is effected between himself and the plaintiff. To the answer of Beinke, appellants plead that the improvements for which he claims were made without their knowledge or consent, and with knowledge of their rights. The court below found that each appellant was

A sale should be ordered when it is for the best interests of all parties concerned. Johnson v. Olmsted, 40 Conn. 609; Tucker v. Parks, 70 Ga. 414; Loufer v. Henke, 73 Ill. 408; Bracecomb v. Ball, Cheves, Eq. 99; Vesper v. Farworth, 40 Wis. 351.

When partition cannot be had without injury to the interests of the co-tenants, a sale and division of the proceeds are as much a matter of right as was actual partition under the common-law rule. Richardson v. Monson, 26 Conn. 97; Johnson v. Olmsted, 40 Conn. 617; Hartmann v. Hartmann, 69 Ill. 103; Metcalf v. Hoopengardner, 55 Iowa, 510; Ritchie v. Munder, 49 Md. 12; Parks v. Bilar, 76 N. Allowance for improvements.

As a general rule a person in possession of land in good faith, even though wrongfully in possession, is entitled to compensation for improvements placed by him upon the premises. Barlow v. Bell, 1 A. K. Marsh. 244.

Where one joint owner has put improvements on the property, he shall receive compensation for his improvements, either by having the part, on which the improvements are, assigned to him at the value of the land without the improvements, or by compensation directed to be made for them. *Hall v. If improvements are made under the mistaken belief that the tenant owns the land, an allowance will be made in proceedings for partition for the amount that the land is enhanced in value. Elrod v. Keller, 89 Ind. 387.

In computation for improvements, the co-tenant against whom they are charged should not be charged with their price, but only his proportion of the amount which they add to the value of the premises, with a deduction, to which he may have a claim, for use and occupation by the co-tenant who made the improvements. Cooter v. Dearborn, 2 West. Rep. 399, 115 Ill. 509.

Co-tenants making improvements are protected in equity. See notes to Moore v. Thorp, supra.

the owner of an undivided $\frac{1}{4}$ of the premises in controversy, including the improvements, subject to a life estate of Dorothea Strohman, now held by Beinke, and that Beinke was the owner of an undivided $\frac{3}{4}$ of the premises, including improvements and the life estate aforesaid. It was ordered that the premises be sold, and $\frac{1}{4}$ of the proceeds be paid to Beinke, and that the remainder be invested under the direction of the court; that the interest thereof be paid to Beinke during the life of Dorothea Strohman, and at her death that such remainder should be paid to appellants.

1. Appellants contend that the court erred in making an allowance against them for improvements made by appellee. Numerous authorities are cited which hold, in effect, that a tenant for life cannot charge the inheritance or remainder estate with the cost or value of improvements; and for the purpose of this case that may be conceded to be the general rule. The question we are required to determine is whether the facts of this case make it an exception to that rule. The land in controversy was purchased from the general government by the father of appellants, who died testate, and a nonresident of Iowa, in the year 1864. He devised to each of the appellants an undivided one third of the land in question, subject to an estate in the mother. Killmer v. Wuckner, 74 Iowa, 300. By a decree of the Keokuk Circuit Court rendered December 31, 1886, from which the appellants in this case did not appeal, that estate was determined to be a life estate in the share of appellant, and an undivided one third in fee simple.

In the year 1869 the grantor of plaintiff obtained from the step-father of appellants, who were then minors, a deed which recited the step father was their guardian, and which purported to convey the land. It was insufficient as a conveyance, but the evidence satisfies us that it was received in good faith, and relied upon and treated as effectual to pass the title of appellants. In the year 1864 plaintiff's grantor acquired the interest devised to the mother, and in the year 1866 he executed to plaintiff a warranty deed for the entire tract of land. Valuable improvements were made upon it, and there is no doubt that plaintiff occupied and treated the premises as his own until the year 1884, when he sold them to Beinke without any knowledge of appellants' claims. When that sale was made an investigation of the title led to a discovery of the claims of appellants. At that time one of them was about thirty-two years of age, and the other was two years younger, and neither had ever resided in Iowa. They did not know of their interest in the land, nor the improvements thereon, until about October, 1884. Beinke first learned of the defect in his title nine months after he had entered into the agreement of purchase, and, as we understand the record, after a large part, if not all, of the improvements had been made. Certainly, all of much value were made before there was any adjudication of his title. It is true, appellee could have ascertained the interests of appellants before making the improvements, but the improvements were made in good faith, and equal in value the worth of the land without them. When made, appellee was rightfully in possession of the land, and only did that which was proper to develop and make it productive. It was taken in a wild, uncultivated state, and by means of the improvements in question was fitted for residence, and made capable of yielding valuable profits. It cannot be partitioned, but must be sold, and the proceeds divided. Appellants have not been injured by the making of the improvements, and they have no just claim to any portion of their value. They will receive the same amount in value under the decree of the district court that they would have received had the improvements not been made, and with that they should be satisfied. Our conclusion is in harmony with the principles of equity, and is not without support of authority. See Thorn v. Thorn, 14 Iowa, 88; Carver v. Coffman, 100 Ind. 547, 8 West. Rep. 306; Coates v. Dearborn, 113 Ill. 570, 3 West. Rep. 300; Ford v. Knapp, 109 N. Y. 135, 3 Out. Rep. 411; 3 Greenl. Ev. § 540, note 1; Freem. Co-tenancy, § 608.

2. Other questions are discussed, but evidently not relied upon, by counsel for appellants. It is suggested that the relief demanded by plaintiffs, and given to them by the district court, should have been sought in an action at law, under the Occupying Claimant Act. But a court of equity, having acquired jurisdiction of the case, has power to afford all proper equitable relief which is demanded. Green Bay Lumber Co. v. Ireland, 77 Iowa, 636.

It is said that the questions involved in this case could have been adjudicated in the case of Killmer v. Wuckner, 74 Iowa, 300. That was an action to quiet title, and the relief demanded in this case was not made an issue in that.

Appellants ask a partition in this case, and for general equitable relief, and cannot be heard to complain because their prayer is granted. We are of the opinion that the finding of the district court as to the shares of appellants is sustained by the evidence, and is fair to them.

The decree of the District Court is affirmed.

McGowan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs, as citizens and taxpayers of the City of Greenville, instituted this proceeding to restrain the City Council from purchasing and operating an electric light plant to light the streets and public buildings of the City, and from using the same for lighting private residences, and also to enjoin the Council from issuing bonds of the corporation in payment therefor, upon the grounds substantially stated by the circuit judge, as follows. First. Because the city charter confers no authority on the Council to purchase this machinery for the purpose of lighting the streets and public buildings. Second. Because the power of the City Council to borrow money for the public use of the corporation has already been exhausted, and that to issue bonds to pay for this plant would be ultra vires. Third. Because 75 cents on the $100 of the assessed value of real and personal property of the corporation is the limit of taxation fixed by the charter, and this enterprise will necessarily force the Council to exceed that limit, and thus increase the burden of the plaintiffs and all the taxpayers. Fourth. Because the purchase includes a costly engine and dynamo for producing incandescent lights for the interior of private residences and places of business, and there is no authority conferred on the Council by the charter to purchase and operate an electric plant for this purpose. Such, briefly and substantially, are the grounds on which the plaintiffs ask relief by injunction.

The City Council, the defendant, answered fully to the merits, admitting paragraphs 1 and 2 of the complaint, but denying each and every other allegation contained in it, not specially denied, admitted or explained, making no objection, however, by plea or demurrer, as to the manner in which the action was brought, in the name alone of the plaintiffs as corporators and taxpayers. The plaintiffs offered in evidence the charter of the City; that an effort had been made to obtain additional powers, which failed; the contracts the City Council had made in reference to the electric plant; the value of the taxable property of the City, its bonded indebtedness, etc.; that the incandescent lights were suitable for lighting the interior of private residences and places of business, but not for lighting the public streets, etc. The City Council, the defendant, offered no testimony, but moved orally at the trial to dismiss the complaint, on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, which motion was considered in connection with the argument on the merits. The circuit judge, remarking, among other things, that he was not willing to depart from what he considered the practice and doctrine of our own courts—if the complaint states good ground for equitable relief, and the injury complained of is peculiar to none, but common to all, the citizens, then the action must be in the name of the State, as relations the taxpayers, or in the name of the attorney general. The individual taxpayer, as such merely, can obtain a standing in court only by alleging and proving that the illegal act complained of will inflict damage special and peculiar to himself, etc.—held that the complaint should be dismissed, for the reason that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. But nevertheless the judge proceeded to consider the case on its merits, and dismissed the complaint, also, on the ground that there was no right or equity in it.

From this decree the plaintiffs appeal to this court, upon the following grounds: "(1) Because his honor erred in holding that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. (2) Because, if said complaint was demurrable at all, it was upon the ground that the plaintiffs had not legal capacity to sue, and the objection, not being taken by demurrer on that ground, was waived. (3) Because, in any event, the plaintiffs should have been allowed to amend by making the State a party on the relation of the attorney-general. (4) Because his honor erred in holding that the City Council of Greenville have authority, under the police powers conferred upon them by section 12 of their charter, to purchase an electric-light plant for the purpose of lighting the streets and public buildings of the City. (5) Because his honor erred in holding that said City Council, under the provisions of section 31 of their charter, have authority to issue bonds to the amount of $100,000, exclusive of the $86,000 of bonds heretofore issued in aid of railroads and graded schools. (6) Because the charter of said City having limited the amount of the annual tax to be levied on the real and personal property of the citizens to 75 cents on the $100, and it appearing, by uncontradicted evidence, that the income of the City is just about sufficient to meet the present expenses, his honor should have held that said Council were without authority to levy an additional tax to meet the interest on any additional bonds, and that, therefore, they had no right to issue them. (7) Because it is respectfully submitted that his honor erred in holding that the said City Council have the right to furnish lights to individuals and others for private purposes, thus using the people's money in speculation and trade. (8) Because it is manifest, from the proof, that one of the chief purposes of the defendant in purchasing the incandescent system of the electric light plant was not simply to light up the public buildings, but to furnish incandescent lights to private residences and places of business for compensation, for which there is no authority in the charter, and to that extent, at least, it is submitted, their contract with the Brush Electric Light Company was clearly ultra vires, and not binding on the City, and that his honor erred in not so holding. (9) Because, if the defendant is permitted to carry out its illegal contract, it will inevitably result in a large increase of the debt of the City, and a proportionate increase in the amount of taxes to be paid by the plaintiffs, and this fact, it is submitted, furnishes sufficient grounds for the relief sought by the plaintiffs, and his honor erred in not so holding," etc.

Exceptions 1, 2 and 3 make the point that it was error in the circuit judge to dismiss the complaint, upon verbal motion at the trial, on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in that the plaintiffs had not legal capacity to sue in their own name, without inserting as plaintiff the State as relators the complaining taxpayers. It will not be necessary to consider whether, as a matter of pleading, the defendant waived the objection, by answering to the merits, without making the objection either by answer or demurrer. In the view the court takes, the objection was purely formal, relating merely to the title of the case, for the plaintiffs might have brought their action according to the formula indicated. The State, in such case, never refuses the use of its name, which might have been added pro forma, by order of the court, at any stage of the proceeding. It is always desirable, when it can be done without a breach of principle or injury to others, that the controversies between parties should be decided on their merits alone.

In considering whether the plaintiffs, as taxpayers of the City of Greenville, had the right to bring this action in their own name for the benefit of themselves and other corporators, without alleging special damage to themselves, it will be proper to keep clearly in view the nature, scope and object of the action. It must not be overlooked that it is a proceeding in equity, by a number of taxpayers of an incorporated city, to prevent certain acts, by the municipal authorities, alleged to be beyond their authority under the charter, to the injury of plaintiffs and all other taxpayers of the corporation, somewhat in the nature of a bill quia timet. Can it be that, in such a case, a number of citizens, taxpayers of a city, cannot be heard against the corporate authorities in a court of equity asking for an injunction against the consummation of the contemplated wrongs, without alleging special damages to themselves individually? There is a certain relation in the nature of agency between the municipal authorities and all taxpayers of the corporation. It does not strike us that the doctrines as to nuisances and public wrongs of that character have any proper application to the case.

We cannot agree that there is any analogy between this case and those of the class of South Carolina Steamboat Co. v. South Carolina R. Co., 80 S. C. 530. That was an action at law for damages, on account of the obstruction of a navigable river, which was a public nuisance to all the world. The parties were in all respects strangers to each other. Here the tax-paying citizens of Greenville are not the whole public, but comparatively a small part of it. They are not strangers to the municipality. They, and they alone, are affected by their acts. As to them this is more in the nature of "a private" than "public" matter.

We think the distinction was well stated in the case of Baltimore v. Gill, 31 Md. 373-384. That was a proceeding to restrain by injunction the mayor and council of Baltimore from carrying out the provisions of an ordinance authorizing the borrowing of money to build certain railroads. The plaintiffs were taxpayers on real and personal property situated in Baltimore, and they sued in behalf of themselves and others similarly situated. It was maintained (as here) that the plaintiffs had no standing in court, and were not entitled to ask the interposition of a court of equity to restrain by injunction the execution of the ordinance. It was further maintained (as here) that the wrong complained of was of "a public nature" affecting the whole public, in which the attorney general, as the representative of the State, was a necessary party. It was held that the interests of the plaintiffs, as taxpayers, were sufficient to entitle them to maintain the action, and that the attorney general was not a necessary party. Bartol, Ch. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The case is to be distinguished from cases of public wrongs, in which the general public are alike concerned; that the plaintiffs 'as taxpayers of the city, and others similarly situated, . . . constitute a class especially damaged by the alleged unlawful act of the corporation, in the alleged increase of the burden of taxation upon their property situated within the city. The complainants have therefore a special interest in the subject matter of the suit, distinct from that of the general public,'—citing the cases of New London v. Brainard, 23 Conn. 552, Webster v. Harwinton, 23 Conn. 181, Merrill v. Plainfield, 45 N. H. 120, McMillan v. Lee County, 3 Iowa, 311, etc.

In the case of Newmyer v. Missouri & M. R. Co., 52 Mo. 81, Mr. Justice Ewing thus vindicates the ruling: "I have examined the cases cited in support of the other side of the question, or such of them as we have had access to, and, upon a careful consideration of the subject, I am of opinion that the decisions, which affirm the right of plaintiffs (or those standing in the same relation to such controversies) to maintain the action rest upon a more solid foundation of principle and reason than those holding the contrary doctrine; and they are commended to our approval as furnishing the only adequate remedy to the injured party for wrongs resulting from unauthorized or illegal acts like those complained of. The injury charged as the result of the acts complained of is a private injury, in which the taxpayers of the County of Macon are the individual sufferers, rather than the public. The people out of the county bear no part of the burden; nor do the people within the county, except the taxpayers, bear any part of it. It is therefore an injury peculiar to one class of persons, namely, the taxpayers of the County of Macon," etc.

It is true, as indicated above, that all the authorities on the subject are not in perfect accord. But, without incumbering this opinion with the numerous authorities, we think it will be sufficient to say that Judge Dillon (certainly our greatest authority on municipal corporations), after a careful analysis and examination of the decisions, states, "as resting upon reason and the preponderance of judicial authority," the following propositions: "(3) That, in the absence of special controlling legislative provision, the proper public officer of the Commonwealth, which created the corporation and prescribed and limited its powers, may, in his own name, or in the name of the State, on behalf of residents and voters of the municipality, exercise the authority, in proper cases, of filing an information or bill in equity, to prevent the misuse of corporate powers, or to set aside or correct illegal corporate acts. (4) That the existence of such a power in the State or its proper public law officer is not inconsisent with the right of any taxable inhabitant to bring a bill to prevent the corporate authorities from transcending their lawful powers, where the effect will be to impose upon him an unlawful tax, or to increase his burden of taxation," etc. See 3 Dillon, Mun. Corp. 3d ed. § 932, and the authorities in note.

We know of no Act of the Legislature or decided case which declares the law of this State to be as contended for. All that is claimed is that it has been "the practice" of the State until it has ripened into law. It does seem to have been the early practice, but we have not been referred to a case in which an action like this was dismissed, for the reason that it was not brought according to the indicated formula. Certainly, since the Code was adopted, in 1870, the practice has not been uniform and unbroken.

Gage v. Charleston, 3 S. C. 401 (1873), was an action for injunction to restrain the city council of Charleston from subscribing to certain railroad companies, brought by "Alva Gage and seven other named persons, inhabitants and property holders of the City of Charleston, for themselves and others, inhabitants and property holders of said city."

Glenn v. York County, 8 S. C. 419 (1873), was an action to restrain the county commissioners from issuing bonds in aid of the construction of a railroad, brought by "E. L. Glenn and others, . . . taxpayers on real and personal property in New York County."

Trimmer v. Bower, 20 S. C. 354 (1885), was an action to restrain the county commissioners of Spartanburg from issuing bonds in aid of a railroad, "brought by Trimmer, Yorborough, Pool, Tillison and Walker," etc. As it seems that the law on the point of the practice "has not been absolutely settled in this State," we have no doubt that the plaintiffs might have given their proceeding the form required by the ruling below; but were they bound to do so on pain of having it dismissed? Was the action brought absolutely inconsistent with the right of the State? We know of no principle or such unbroken "practice" in the State as requires the court to hold that the proceeding was unauthorized. We think the plaintiffs had a standing in court, and were entitled to have their case heard on its merits.

The charter of the City of Greenville, as amended in 1886 (19 Stat. at L. 106), contains the following provisions for the government of the City. Section 12 provides that the Council "may purchase, hold, possess and enjoy to them, and their successors, in perpetuity or for any term of years, any estate, real, personal or mixed, and sell, lease, alien and convey the same: provided, that the same shall not at any time exceed the sum of ($100,000) one hundred thousand dollars; and the said City Council shall have full power and authority to make and establish all such rules, by-laws and ordinances, respecting the roads, streets, market and police department of said City, and the government thereof, as shall appear to them necessary and requisite for the security, welfare and convenience of said City, for preserving health, life and property therein, and securing the peace and good government of the same," etc. Section 19 gives the City Council the right to levy annually a tax on the assessed property of the City "sufficient to discharge and defray all expenses of carrying into effect the ordinances, rules, regulations and laws made and established as above provided: provided, said tax does not exceed 75 cents upon every $100 of real and personal property as assessed and equalized;" and section 31 provides "that the said City Council shall have power to borrow money for the public use of the corporation, by issuing from time to time, as occasion may require, the bonds of said corporation, bearing interest, . . . for an amount not to exceed the sum of one hundred thousand dollars ($100,000), and for the payment of the interest," etc.

In order to prevent confusion, we will first dispose of the preliminary question as to the ordinary expenses of the city government of Greenville, and the prohibition claimed to exist in the charter, against increasing the bonded debt of the City beyond $100,000. It is urged that the debt already amounts to $38,000 (principally for subscriptions to railroads and public schools), and, with the $21,000 now proposed to be added, it will be extended beyond the limit. Upon casually reading the provision, the first impression may be that it was intended to limit the whole bonded debt, for any and all purposes, to $100,000. Indeed, unless such was the purpose, it would hardly seem necessary to fix a limit at all. But upon close examination we cannot say that such is the proper construction. The words are (in 1885), "to borrow money for the public use of the corporation by issuing . . . bonds . . . for an amount not to exceed the sum of $100,000," omitting the words of the old charter (1843), "but never in any form to make the City liable for exceeding that amount in the aggregate."

We agree that the framers of the provision intended to give the authority to issue bonds subsequent to the date of the charter, "for the public use of the corporation," to the extent of $100,000. See Hitchcock v. Galveston, 90 U. S. 349 [24 L. ed. 661].

Then the question is whether, under the aforesaid provisions of the charter, the City Council had the power to purchase, own and operate, at the expense of the City, an electric-light plant for the double purpose of lighting the streets of the City and providing incandescent lights to individuals for the interior of private residences and business offices and purposes.

Judge Dillon, in his Municipal Corporations, 3d ed. § 80, states as follows: "It is a general and undisputed proposition of law that a municipal corporation possesses and can exercise the following powers, and no others; first, those granted in express words; second, those necessarily or fairly implied in or incident to the powers expressly granted; third, those essential to the declared objects and purposes of the corporation,—not simply convenient, but indispensable. Any fair, reasonable doubt concerning the existence of power is resolved by the courts against the corporation, and the power is denied. Of every municipal corporation, the charter or statute by which it is created is its Organic Act. Neither the corporation nor its officers can do any act, or make any contract, or incur any liability, not authorized thereby. All acts beyond the scope of the powers granted are void," etc.

Now, tested by this principle so clearly stated, how does the matter stand? Clearly, the charter does not give the power to purchase this plant in express words. It does not so give even the power to light the City, but we assume that this latter power may be fairly implied from the grant of the police power. The City Council had previously lighted the City with gas, and we suppose that it might do so with electricity as well. The lighting, however, with gas, was done by contract, and the new feature complained of is that the Council now propose to purchase, own and operate the engines, dynamos and machinery which produce the electricity, and to pay for them by issuing municipal bonds. This seems to be a new question. It strikes us as remarkable that, in the multitude of cases cited by the distinguished counsel who argued the case, there should not be in one of them the least reference to this precise point. We have made diligent search, and have not been able to find one. We must decide it, but without any help from authorities. The City has the express power to own property, and it also has the implied right to light the City. Do these powers necessarily imply the right to make the City the owner of the plant and a manufacturer of electricity? It is quite certain that such power is not "essential" to the declared objects and purposes of the corporation, for heretofore the City has been lighted by contract, without owning the gas fixtures. The purchase of the electric plant was certainly a new departure, and it is to be hoped that it may not prove to be troublesome and expensive to the City. But considering that some discretion, as to the mode and manner, should be allowed the municipality, in carrying out the conceded power to light the streets of the City, we hold that the purchase of the plant was not ultra vires and void, so far as it was designed to produce electricity suitable for and used in lighting the streets and public buildings of the City. But we cannot so hold as to the purchase of so much of that plant as furnished the incandescent light for use in the interior of private residences and places of business, which cannot be properly included within the power to light the streets of the City. The uncontradicted testimony was that the incandescent light is not suitable for lighting the public streets. We are therefore unable to agree with the circuit judge when he said that "if the City, from the same plant, can provide incandescent lights to private residences and places of business for compensation, and thus make the system, in part, at least, self-sustaining, economy and good business management should sustain the transaction," etc. As we understand it, all the powers given to the City Council were for the sole and exclusive purpose of government, and not to enter into private business of any kind, outside of the scope of the city government. In that very direction, especially in these latter times, is the dangerous and growing tendency of municipal corporations. It is very important, for the interest of all, to keep them strictly within the legitimate limits of their powers. The power given to the City Council to issue bonds, so as to bind not only all the taxpayers of the City, but their children as well, is a very high confidence and trust, and can be properly exercised for no other purpose than "for the public use of the corporation," no matter how great the temptation may be. Without regard to good "business arrangements," which may present themselves, such a power must be strictly pursued. We cannot suppose that it was intended to give the City Council, as such, the right to go into commerce, to buy for the purpose of selling goods, or to enter into any private business or speculation whatever. As, for instance, if the City Council, owning horses, in the discharge of their police duties should find it necessary to establish a blacksmith shop, we do not think they would be within their corporate duties to open it for the accommodation of the public, with or without compensation.

In the case of Ottawa v. Carey, 108 U. S. 110 [28 L. ed. 609], the following propositions were announced: (1) "To the extent of their authority, they [municipal corporations] can bind the people and the property subject to their regulation and governmental control, by what they do, but beyond their corporate powers their acts are of no effect." (2) "Power to govern the city does not imply power to expend the public money to make the water in the rivers available for manufacturing purposes." Chief Justice Waite, in delivering the judgment of the court, said: "The charter confers all the powers usually granted to a city for the purposes of local government, but that has never been supposed, of itself, to authorize taxes for everything which, in the opinion of the city authorities, would 'promote the general prosperity and welfare of the municipality.' Undoubtedly the development of the water-power in the rivers that traverse the city would add to the commerce and wealth of the citizens, but certainly power to govern the city does not imply power to expend the public money to make the water in the rivers available for manufacturing purposes," etc.

We cannot doubt that the purchase of the system producing incandescent lights, so far as it was to furnish lights to private persons, with or without compensation, was not a corporate act of the City Council, and binding upon the corporation, but was beyond their authority, as the governing body of the corporation.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and the cause remanded to the circuit for such further proceedings as may be deemed necessary to carry into effect the conclusion herein announced.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA

v.
DOWELL, Appt.

(.....N. C.....)

1. A husband may be guilty of an assault with intent to commit rape upon his wife, where by threats of death he compels another man to attempt to ravish her.

2. There is a sufficient criminal intent to sustain a conviction of one who compels another through fear of death to make an actual attempt to commit a crime, although the latter acts solely under compulsion.

(Merrimon, Ch. J., dissent.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Rowan County convicting him of an assault with intent to commit rape. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. No appearance for appellant.

Mr. Theodore F. Davidson, Atty-Gen., for the State.

Shepherd, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Ordinarily, precedent is grateful to the judicial mind, as something approved and steadfast, on which it may rest with confidence; but sometimes cases arise of such exceptional enormity that, for the fair name of humanity, the judge would hope to find no counterpart in criminal annals. We incline to believe that the case under consideration is one of such bad eminence. Unmatched in iniquity, as it appears to be, it is hoped, however, that the application of a few elementary principles will harmonize the conclusion to which we have arrived, not only with our moral conceptions of what should be the law, but also with its strict, formal administration.

The facts are abhorrently simple. The white husband of a white wife, under menace of death to both parties in case of refusal, and supporting his threat by a loaded gun held over the parties, constrains a colored man to undertake, and his wife to submit to, an attempted sexual connection. The details of this shocking transaction are so disgusting that we will not stain the pages of our reports with their particular recital. Suffice it to say that, under the coercion of the defendant, Lowery, the Force and resistance.

While force, actual or constructive, is a necessary ingredient in the crime committed on a female over ten years of age (Lewis v. State, 30 Ala. 54; McNair v. State, 55 Ala. 458; People v. Royal, 58 Cal. 62; Bradley v. State, 23 Ark. 704; Cato v. State, 9 Fla. 163; People v. Bartow, 1 Wheeler, Cr. Cas. 378; Walter v. People, 50 Barb. 144; Reg. v. Fletcher, L. R. 1 Cr. Cas. Aiders and abettors guilty as principals.

To be an aider and abettor it is immaterial that the party is disqualified from being the principal actor by reason of age, sex, condition or class. Boggus v. State, 34 Ga. 275; State v. Even a woman may be punishable for aiding and abetting the perpetrator of the crime. Boggus v. State, supra; 1 Russ. Cr. 9th ed. 204.

All persons present aiding or abetting the offense, or encouraging its commission, are principals. Strang v. People, 24 Mich. 1. See United States v. Gooding, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 400 (6 L. ed. 638); People v. Woodward, 45 Cal. 233; King v. State, 21 Ga. 221; Hawkins v. State, 13 Ga. 323; Boyd v. State, 17 Ga. 194; Smith v. People, 74 Ill. 144; Williams v. Although a husband cannot individually commit rape upon his wife (Lord Audley's Case, 3 How. St. Tr. 401; 1 Hale, P. C. 829), yet he may be liable as principal for aiding and abetting another in the commission of the crime, the offense being a felony. Ibid.; Hemanus v. State, 7 Tex. App. 373; Strang v. People and People v. Woodward, supra; Com. v. Murphy, 2 Allen, 168; Com. v. Fogarty, 8 Gray, 489; Lord Audley's Case, supra; Rex v. Warden of the Fleet, 13 Mod. 340.

colored man, did actually make the attempt. Indeed, he did everything necessary to constitute the crime of rape except actual penetration. Fortunately the fright and excitement rendered him incapable of consummating the outrage, which, as we understand the case, he would otherwise have perpetrated; and, alike fortunately, at, perhaps, the critical moment, the gun discharging itself in the hands of the unnatural husband, the enforced assailant was enabled to effect his escape.

Under the laws of this State, the offense of an assault with intent to commit rape, although subject to very severe punishment, is technically a misdemeanor; and, there being no degrees in this class of crimes, it must follow that, if the defendant is guilty at all, he must be guilty as a principal. The defendant strangely insists that he is not guilty because he is the husband of the prosecutrix; and he relies as a defense upon the marital relation, the duties and obligations of which he has, by all the laws of God and man, so brutally violated. In our opinion, in respect to this offense, he stands upon the same footing as a stranger, and his guilt is to be determined in that light alone. The person of everyone is, as a rule, jealously guarded by the law from any involuntary contact, however slight, on the part of another. The exceptions, as in the case of a parent, or one in loco parentis, moderately chastising a child (State v. Harris, 68 N. C. 1), or a schoolmaster, a pupil (State v. Pendergrass, 2 Dev. & B. L. 385, and Boyd v. State, 53 Ala. 169), are strict and rare.

It was at one time held in our State that the relation of husband and wife gave the former immunity to the extent that the courts would not go behind the domestic curtain, and scrutinize too nicely every family disturbance, even though amounting to an assault. State v. Rhodes, Phil. L. 452. But since State v. Oliver, 70 N. C. 60, and subsequent cases, we have refused "the blanket of the dark" to these outrages on female weakness and defenselessness. So it is now settled that, technically, a husband cannot commit even a slight assault upon his wife, and that her person is as sacred from his violence as from that of any other person. It is true that he may enforce sexual connection; and, in the exercise of this marital right, it is held that he cannot be guilty of the offense of rape. But it is too plain for argument that this privilege is a personal one, only. Hence if, as in Lord Audley's Case, 3 How. St. Tr. 401, the husband aids and abets another to ravish his wife, he may be convicted as if he were a stranger. The principle is thus tersely expressed by Sir Matthew Hale: "For, though in marriage she hath given up her body to her husband, she is not to be by him prostituted to another." Hale, P. C. 626; 3 Bishop, Cr. L. 1185; Lord Audley's Case, 3 How. St. Tr. 401.

It thus appearing, we think beyond all question, that the defendant in this indictment is to be regarded as a stranger, we will further consider the case in that aspect alone. It is contended that, as Lowery acted under coercion, and was for that reason excusable, there was no intent to commit rape, and therefore the defendant cannot be convicted. It will be observed that the intent of Lowery to commit the offense is not determined alone by the presumption that everyone is presumed to intend the natural consequences of his act; but he testifies that he did actually attempt to have sexual connection. Here, then, we have a specific, actual intent to commit the foul deed; and can it be that he who constrains the will of another to commit such a crime is to be permitted to shield himself upon the ground that there was an entire absence of criminal intent? If this be true, then one who coerces another to shoot down a third person in cold blood is not guilty of murder, because there was no intent for which the person doing the shooting is criminally responsible. The law in such a case couples the act of the instrument with the felonious intent of the instigator, and in this way he is held guilty of murder; and this is true, also, where the instrument is under the age of seven, and conclusively presumed to be incapable of having any criminal intent. So, too, if one is indicted under our Statute for shooting at a railroad train with intent to injure it, and it appears that he coerced another to do the shooting, can it with reason be said that he is not guilty because his instrument did not have an intent to inflict any injury? These and other examples which we could cite from our reports well illustrate the principle upon which our case depends; and especially in this so when, as we have said, the specific intent is expressly shown by the testimony. We are clearly of the opinion that the unlawful act committed in pursuance of the combined intents of the defendant and his enforced instrument are amply sufficient to sustain the conviction.

While placing our decision upon this ground, we are not prepared to say that, under the circumstances, Lowery would have been excusable had he completed the offense. We leave this as an open question, remarking, however, that the tabula in naufragio of Lord Bacon has been well nigh submerged by judicial and critical casuists. See Whart. Horn. §§ 560, 561, and notes to second edition; United States v. Holmes, 1 Wall. Jr. 1. See also Coleridge, C. J., in the Case of the Migniotte, decided in 1834.

But mark the diversity: There the displaced struggler for life was, by clinging to the plank, insufficient for two, as much attacking his companion in shipwreck, as if he were firing at him with a pistol. In our case the victim is entirely innocent,—in no way threatening by her act or deed any harm to the attempted ravisher. In this view of the case, let us briefly refer to the authorities.

In Broom, Legal Maxims, 17, 18, it is said: "In accordance with the principle, necessitas inducit privilegium, the law excuses the commission of an act prima facie criminal if such act be done involuntarily, and under circumstances which show that the individual doing it was not really a free agent. Thus, if A by force take the hand of B, in which is a weapon, and therewith kill C, A is guilty of murder, but B is excused; though if merely a moral force be used, as threats, duress of imprisonment or even an assault to the peril of his life, in order to compel him to kill C, this is no legal excuse." For this is cited 1 Hale, P. C. 404, which seems to be entirely in point.

294), undertakes to argue that, "If the commission of treason may be extenuated by the fear of present death . . . there seems no reason why this offense [homicide, or any of the other capital offenses, of course] may not also be mitigated upon the like consideration of human infirmity." 1 Bishop, Cr. L. 848. To this, however, an answer is found in 4 Bl. Com 80, where he says: "In time of war or rebellion, a man may be justified in doing many treasonable acts, by compulsion of the enemy or rebels, which would admit of no excuse in the time of peace. This, however, seems only, or at least principally, to hold as to positive crimes, so created by the laws of society, and which, therefore, society may excuse, but not as to natural offenses, so declared by the law of God. . . . And, therefore, though a man may be violently assaulted, and hath no other possible means of escaping death but by killing an innocent person, this fear and force shall not acquit him of murder; for he ought rather to die himself than escape by the murder of an innocent."

If this be so, and the crime of rape is considered so heinous as to be punishable in the same way as murder, it would seem that "human infirmity" ought not to be tolerated by our laws to the extent of excusing one for the violation of female virtue on the plea of danger to himself, however great or imminent. For the reasons first stated, we think that the ruling of his honor was correct, and that there is no error.

Merrimon, C. J., dissenting:

The horrible and detestable purpose of the defendant in doing the acts which constitute the criminal offense committed by him against his wife cannot warrant what I deem a misapplication of well-established principles of criminal law. In the nature of the marriage relation, the husband himself cannot ravish his wife; nor, for like reasons, can he, in a legal sense, assault her with the intent to commit a rape upon her. He can only commit the offense of rape, or that of assault with intent to commit a rape, against his wife, by procuring, aiding, abetting or encouraging another to commit these offenses. His offense in such case depends, necessarily, upon the perpetration of the principal offense by another party. In this case the negro named did not commit a rape upon the wife of the defendant, nor did he assault her with such intent. There was a total absence of such intent on his part. Then, in the nature of the matter, how can the defendant be chargeable with the particular offense charged against him in the indictment? As the negro committed no assault with intent to commit a rape, so the defendant did not. It is said, Shall the defendant go quit? Has he committed no offense? Most unquestionably he shall not go quit. He has committed an offense,—a very serious one. He is chargeable with an assault upon his wife with a deadly weapon, and with the intent to kill, and a like assault upon the negro. It is said the punishment of the offense last mentioned is not adequate. It may be very severe. But it may be said as well that the punishment for the offense as charged is not adequate. This, however, is no argument; not the slightest reason pertinent here. The courts have nothing to do with the punishment of offenders, further than to impose the same in the cases, and as required and allowed by law. I will not pursue the subject further.

RICHMOND & DANVILLE R. CO.

(...N. C....)

Rolling stock of a nonresident railroad company, used in interstate commerce, is not subject to taxation in a State where it is operating a leased railroad.

(March 17, 1890.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Wake County denying part of the relief claimed in an action to recover taxes alleged to be due and unpaid. Affirmed. The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Theodore F. Davidson, Atty-Gen., and R. H. Battle for appellant.

Messrs. D. Schenck and C. M. Busbee for appellee.

Merrimon, C. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff is the treasurer of North Carolina. The defendant is a corporation of the State of Virginia, and has a lease of the railroad of the North Carolina Railroad Company, a corporation of this State; and it does the business of transportation in, through and across this State from the State of Virginia and other States to the State of South Carolina and other States. The purpose of this action is to recover the sum of $330 as taxes alleged to be due this State from the defendant, and for costs.

The following are the facts found by the court below, and its judgment thereupon: "(1) The Richmond & Danville Railroad Company was on June 1, 1888, the owner of $17,500 worth of rolling stock, to wit, four switching engines and one coach, which were on June 1, 1888, used exclusively in North Carolina, but owned in Virginia, and which the Company never at any time recall. (2) Upon all the rolling stock of the Richmond & Danville Railroad

NOTE.—Taxation of rolling stock of railroad companies.

The rolling stock of a railroad is personal property, and constitutes no part of its real estate. Ottumwa W. M. Co. v. Hawley, 44 Iowa, 57; Boston C. & M. R. Co. v. Gilmore, 57 N. H. 410; Randall v. Ellwell, 22 N. Y. 221; Hoyle v. Pittsburgh & M. R. Co., 54 N. Y. 214; Meyer v. Johnston, 22 Ala. 227; Coe v. Columbus, P. & L. R. Co., 10 Ohio St. 272; Traff v. Hewitt, 1 Ohio, 511; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Fort Howard, 21 Wis. 43.

Engines and cars are no more appendages of a railroad than are wagons and carriages of a highway, and they do not constitute a part of it. State v. Somerville & E. R. Co., 24 N. J. L. 21; Williamson v. New Jersey S. R. Co., 29 N. J. Eq. 211.

Pullman palace cars not owned by the railroad company are included in the rolling stock of the railroad and taxed as such to its owners. Kennedy v. St. Louis, V. & T. H. R. Co., 62 Ill. 224.

Under the statutes of some States, however, the Company the Company is assessed for taxation, and does pay taxes in Virginia. (3) The rolling stock of the North Carolina Railroad Company is used exclusively in North Carolina; and upon all this rolling stock, of the assessed value of $125,000, taxes are assessed and paid in North Carolina by the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company, the lessee. (4) The board of appraisers and assessors of the North Carolina Railroad made the assessment, as set out as an exhibit to complaint, of $175,000 upon the rolling stock of the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company in use in North Carolina on June 1, 1898. (5) On June 1, 1898, there was in use on the North Carolina Railroad, leased by the Richmond & Danville Railroad in North Carolina, rolling stock passing through the State to the value of $175,000. Such rolling stock was owned by the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company, and the trailers in which said rolling stock was used were made up outside of North Carolina and went on through to the State of South Carolina. Upon this state of facts, his honor ruled that the defendant Company was liable to pay taxes to the State upon $175,000, on the engines and coach used exclusively in North Carolina, and was not liable to pay upon $157,500 the remainder, used in interstate commerce. Therefore, it is adjudged that the plaintiff recover of the defendant the sum of $95 and interest from July 1, 1898, and costs."

The power and right of the State to tax property of nonresidents, whether these be natural or artificial persons, having its situs within the State for the purposes of business, convenience or pleasure of the owners thereof or others, is too well settled to admit of serious question. This important right of the State is surely founded upon the just ground that such property has the protection, advantage and benefit of the laws of the State; and it ought, on that account, to be required to contribute as taxes its fair share towards the support of the government whose benefits extend to it, not merely casually, but regularly and continuously, while it continues to be so located, as to other like property of residents of the State. Upon principles of common justice, every property owner should contribute to the support of the government that protects and renders his property valuable and useful his fair proportion of money as a consideration therefor, unless for some proper cause he is excused from doing so. Alamy v. Powell, 2 Jones, Eq. 31. *Radmond v. If the State were absolutely sovereign in all respects, it might tax property coming into it temporarily from another State for the purposes of trade, or property passing across its territory from one State to another or other States in the course of trade, travel and commerce. It might tax such trade and travel, in the discretion of its Legislature. But, as a member and constituent part of the Federal Union, it does not possess unlimited powers of taxation as to all property, matters and things that might otherwise be deemed and made subjects thereof. It and its authorities, including its courts of justice, are bound by that Constitution; and it is its and their duty to observe, administer and enforce its provisions in proper cases and connections,—as much so as its own Constitution and laws. Indeed, the Constitution of the United States is a part of the Organic Law of this State; and, in principle and theory, there is not, and cannot be, any conflict between the Constitution and laws of the United States and the same of this State. If conflict, in fact, exists in any respect, as, unhappily, is sometimes the case, it is so because those who determine what the law is, administer and enforce it, are ignorant of or misapprehend its true meaning and application, or willfully disregard and disobey it.

A leading and very important purpose of the Federal Union was to establish and secure the freedom of trade and commerce, both foreign and domestic, and, particularly for the present purpose, between and among the several States comprising it. To this end, it is provided in rolling stock is considered real estate and assessed with the road as a whole. Bangamon & M. R. Co. v. Morgan Co. 14 Ill. 163; Mann v. Logansport, P. & B. R. Co. 27 Ill. 77; Louisville & N. A. R. Co. v. State, 25 Ind. 177; Dubuque v. Illinois C. R. Co. 22 Iowa, 44; Bangor & P. R. Co. v. Harris, 22 Me. 521; Cumhertland M. R. Co. v. Portland, 27 Me. 444; State v. Severance, 24 Mo. 371.

In the absence of legislation to the contrary, the rolling stock of a railroad, being personal property, is to be taxed to the road at the place of its domicile. It cannot be assessed except at the place which contains the home office of the company. Kennedy v. St. Louis, V. & T. R. Co. 60 Ill. 386; Louisville & N. A. R. Co. v. State, 25 Ind. 177; Portland, S. & P. R. Co. v. State, 60 Me. 198; Appeal Tax Court v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 60 Md. 397; *Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. But for purposes of taxation, the situs of personal property of a railroad company may be fixed in whatever locality the property may be brought and used by its owner, by the law of the place where it is found. Marye v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 137 U. S. 117 [33 L. ed. 35].

The rolling stock of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, a Maryland corporation employed in the operation of other railroads in Virginia, by virtue of lease or contract, is not taxable under Va. Laws 1861-62, chap. 119, which apply only to Virginia corporations. Ibid.

its Constitution (art. 1, § 8, par. 3) that "the Congress shall have power . . . to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." The power thus conferred is indefinite as to its scope, and capable of very latitudinous interpretation and exercise, particularly as it is part of the Organic Law, and the subject to which it relates is one of great breadth and compass. It is difficult to determine its just limit in many respects; but it should receive a reasonable interpretation, such as will effectuate the purpose contemplated, trenching as little as practicable upon the powers, rights and conveniences of the States. Very certainly the provision implies that Congress should regulate such commerce, and the States shall not; that Congress shall do so effectually, in such way and by such means as will secure, promote and encourage the same, and that the States shall not, if disposed to do so, interfere with, destroy, hinder or delay the same, or divert it in any way, by any legal constraint, for their own advantage, otherwise than, to a very limited extent, as allowed by the Constitution. Hence, it is settled that a State cannot tax commerce, trade, travel, transportation or the privilege to carry on and conduct the same, or the vehicles, means and appliances employed and used in connection therewith, coming into that State from another temporarily, however frequently, and returning to such other State; nor can it tax such commerce, or such incidents thereto, passing across it from another or other States to another or other States, however often this may be done.

And the reason is that to so tax such commerce, and the incidents thereto, including such means of transportation, would tend directly, and have the effect, in a greater or less degree and extent, to interfere with the freedom of commerce among and between the people of the States. It would have the certain effect to embarrass, hinder and delay the free course of such trade. If a State could thus tax such commerce at all, it might, in its discretion, for its own benefit and advantage, tax it so heavily as to practically destroy it within its own borders, and in possible cases prevent it from passing freely into other States. Moreover, if one State might tax it, every State through which it passed might do so likewise; and thus the power of Congress to regulate interstate trade and commerce would be nugatory and a sheer mockery. It is clear that a State has no such power, and the Supreme Court of the United States has authoritatively so decided, directly and in effect, in many cases. Hays v. Pacific M. & S. Co. 58 U. S. 17 How. 596 [15 L. ed. 254]; Morgan v. Parham, 88 U. S. 16 Wall. 471 [21 L. ed. 803]; Glover v. Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 100 [29 L. ed. 158], and numerous cases there cited; Pickard v. Pullman S. C. Co. 117 U. S. 84 [20 L. ed. 785]; Leloup v. Port of Mobile, 127 U. S. 640 [33 L. ed. 811].

The Statute (Acts N. C. 1887, chap. 187, §§ 44-51), properly interpreted, does not, and was not intended to, embrace and tax the property of the defendant put in question by this appeal. It had reference to, and embraced property of, corporations, whether resident or not, whose property was situated—had a situs—in this State, and was thus subject to be taxed. But the property in question was not, in a legal sense, located—situated—in this State. It had no situs here. It was the property of a nonresident corporation, employed and used by it, constantly, for the purposes of transportation, in the course of the conduct of interstate trade and commerce coming into and passing across this State, from another and other States to and into another and other States. It was not stationary, but constantly in transitu from one State to another. The mere fact that property of the defendant of the value mentioned was continuously within the State did not give it a situs here. It was continually changing and in transitu in the course of interstate commerce. It was so continuously in this State, day and night, because of the great volume of trade and travel passing over the defendant's road into and across this State, going to other States.

It is true, as suggested on the argument, that such property receives protection from this State, and has benefit of its laws; but, nevertheless, it is not the subject of taxation, because the Constitution of the United States will not, as we have seen, allow it to be made such subject.

Judgment affirmed.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

COMMONWEALTH of Pennsylvania

Charles OLEARY, App't.

(....Pa....)

1. The benefit of the good character of a person charged with crime is not limited to cases where there is a reasonable doubt of his guilt, but evidence of his good character may itself create the reasonable doubt which will entitle him to acquittal.

2. It is not competent to prove the intoxication of a person by showing the condition of one who was with him, and who had taken the same number of drinks.

(May 12, 1890.)

NOTE.—Criminal law; good character as a defense.

Evidence of the general good character of one accused of crime, in the community where he is best known, is admissible in his defense (State v. King, 78 Mo. 555; Jones v. State, 10 Tex. App. 528; Brownlee v. State, 12 Tex. App. 335); but the goodness of his character subsequent to the commission of the offense is not provable. Brown v. State, 48 Ala. 175; State v. Kinley, 48 Iowa, 394.

Evidence is admissible to show that his previous good character was such as to render it unlikely that he could be guilty of the particular crime charged against him. *People v. APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Oyer and Terminer for Clinton County convicting him of the crime of murder in the first degree. Reversed.

On the evening of March 12, 1889, Cleary, in company with one Belford, encountered on the streets of the Borough of Renovo, Philip Paul, who was the police officer of the borough. Cleary and Belford were both disorderly and under the influence of liquor. Paul for some reason caught Cleary by the coat collar and started with him towards the lock-up. As they reached the lock up Cleary drew a pistol and shot Paul, killing him instantly.

Defendant introduced evidence as to his good character. He also offered to prove by one Reese that Belford, who was the same person shown to have been drinking with the defendant during the evening of the alleged killing, and to have drunk every time and no oftener than the defendant, and with one exception to have drunk each time the same kind of drink as defendant, when he came to witness' office was very much intoxicated; to be followed by proof that Belford is older than defendant, although under the age of twenty one years; that defendant is of a nervous temperament, and therefore more susceptible to the influence of intoxicating liquors than Belford.

Objected to by Commonwealth.

Objection sustained. Evidence excluded. Exception. (First assignment of error.)

The court charged, inter alia, as follows:

"The intoxication of the prisoner may be material, and is evidence to be considered by the jury for the purpose of enabling them to determine whether at the time of the commission of the crime the prisoner was so much intoxicated, and his intellect clouded, as to deprive him of the power to think and weigh the nature of the act committed." "Was he able to deliberate and premeditate the homicide?" "The mere intoxication of the prisoner will not exclude or palliate his offense, unless he was in such a state of intoxication as to be incapable of conceiving any intent. If he was his grade of offense is reduced to murder in the second degree." (Third assignment of error.)

Messrs. W. C. Kress and C. B. McCormick for appellant.

Messrs. A. W. Brungard, Dist-Atty., and T. C. Hipple for appellee.

Paxson, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

But for a single error this judgment might have been affirmed. The learned judge below instructed the jury, in his general charge, that "good character is always of importance, and is evidence to be duly considered by the jury, and may turn the scale where there is a reasonable doubt as to the degree or grade of the crime." (Second assignment.) This is all the charge contains upon this subject; there was no point put to the court in regard to it.

The fact that the homicide was committed by the appellant was not disputed below nor here, nor was there any attempt to show that the offense was manslaughter. The sole question was as to the degree of murder. The jury convicted appellant of murder in the first degree.

We think the evidence of good character is applicable both to the commission of the offense and the grade of the crime. So far we are in accord with the trial judge. But we think he stated inaccurately the law as applicable to good character.

In Heine v. Com., 91 Pa. 145, the court below instructed the jury: "If a man is guilty his previous good character has nothing to do with the case, but if you have reasonable doubts as to his guilt, then character steps in and aids in determining that doubt." This ruling was reversed by this court, Mr. Justice Gordon saying: "The effect of this was to give the evidence of good character no weight whatever, for if the other testimony left in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt, this of itself, without more, entitled him to an acquittal. Evidence of good character is not a mere make-weight thrown in to assist in the production of a result that would happen at all events, but it is positive evidence, and may of itself, by the creation of a reasonable doubt, produce an acquittal"—citing Wharton, Cr. L. § 643.

In Hanney v. Com., 116 Pa. 323, 8 Cent. Rep. 184, the court below fell into the same error as in Heine v. Com., supra, and upon its review in this court the judgment was reversed, Justice Gordon repeating and amplifying his remarks in the former case.

It was urged, however, that Kilpatrick v. Com., 81 Pa. 198, sustains the ruling of the court below. The portion of the charge assigned as error in that case is as follows: "The evidence proves the defendant to have borne an excellent reputation; originally evidence of good character was not allowed to go to the jury when there was positive proof of the commission of an offense, for if one was seen to commit a murder with deliberation, although he had borne an irreproachable character, and were even an angel, he would yet be guilty; the rule of the law in this State, however, permits evidence of good character to be submitted to the jury in every case of homicide, no matter what may be the other evidence in the case. But when a doubt suggests itself to your minds as to the prisoner's guilt, upon the facts of the case as presented by the evidence, the law casts the whole weight of the prisoner's former good character in mercy's scale, and settles the question in favor of the accused."

In commenting upon this language, this court said, through Mr. Justice Strong: "The final exception is that the court erred in the instruction which they gave to the jury respecting the evidence of the prisoner's good character. This, like the former, is based upon a misconception of the charge. We do not understand the purport of the instruction to have been such as it is contended to have been by the counsel for the plaintiff in error. The substance of the charge was that the law permitted evidence of good character to be submitted to the jury (of course for their consideration) in every case of homicide, no matter what might be the other testimony in the case, and that when a doubt arises as to the guilt of the accused, such doubt was conclusive in his favor. This by no means confined the jury to attaching importance to the evidence only in cases of reasonable doubt, on the contrary, it left them at liberty to make it a basis for the formation of a doubt."

I have been thus careful to quote the exact language of the court below and of this court in Kilpatrick v. Com., as I fear it has been misunderstood in some instances.

The distinction between the two cases, briefly stated, is this: In the case in hand the benefit of good character was limited to cases where there is a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused; or, in the precise language of the court below, "may turn the scale where there is a reasonable doubt as to the degree or grade of the crime;" while in Kilpatrick v. Com., the language of the court below, while not as explicit as in some of the later cases, to repeat again the language of Justice Strong, "by no means confined the jury to attaching importance to the evidence only in cases of reasonable doubt; on the contrary, it left them at liberty to make it a basis for the formation of a doubt."

There is nothing in the charge of the court below from which the jury could fairly infer that the evidence of good character might create the reasonable doubt which entitles the prisoner to a safe deliverance.

It is true that the difference in phraseology in the two cases is apparently slight. There is, however, a real and substantial difference, and where a man's life may depend upon a single word, the use of language cannot be attended with too much care.

We might cite numerous other cases upon this point, but the law is too well settled to require it. The rule deducible from the authorities may be briefly stated thus: Evidence of good character is always admissible for the defendant in a criminal case; it is to be weighed and considered in connection with all the other evidence in the case—it may of itself in some instances create the reasonable doubt which entitles the accused to an acquittal.

The rule itself is not merely merciful; it is both reasonable and just. There may be cases in which, owing to the peculiar circumstances in which a man is placed, evidence of good character may be all he can offer in answer to a charge of crime. Of what avail is a good character, which a man may have been a lifetime in acquiring, if it is to benefit him nothing in his hour of peril?

The vice of this portion of the charge is in the instruction that good character "may turn the scale where there is a reasonable doubt as to the degree or grade of the crime." But if the other evidence is such as to raise a reasonable doubt whether the grade of crime was murder in the first degree, then the jury are bound to acquit of that offense, so that, as was observed in the cases cited, "this was to give the evidence of good character no weight whatever." The evidence of good character is to be considered with the other evidence in the case, and if it all combined creates a reasonable doubt, the defendant is entitled to an acquittal.

The learned judge below evidently was of opinion that the evidence of good character had little bearing upon the case. I gather this from his opinion refusing a new trial, in which he said, in commenting upon this portion of his charge: "Of this instruction the defendant has no cause of complaint, it was as favorable to him as he could ask. In fact, as the commission of the crime by the defendant was not disputed, and the only question for the jury to determine was the grade or degree of the crime, and as the determination of that question depended upon the mental condition of the defendant, whether intoxicated or not, we are of opinion that the evidence of the defendant's good character had little relevancy."

We do not think the premises upon which this conclusion was drawn are entirely accurate. We do not understand that the commission of the crime was undisputed by the defendant. It is true the commission of the homicide was conceded, but not the commission of murder in the first degree. That was the crime for which he was on trial and of which he was convicted. The commission of that offense was disputed below and also in this court. Nor did the question of the degree depend alone "upon the mental condition of the defendant, whether intoxicated or not." The jury found that he was not intoxicated to the extent of preventing his forming the willful, deliberate and premeditated intent to take the life of the deceased. Just here is the place where the evidence of good character was entitled to come in and have its due weight. Here was his supreme peril. The defense of intoxication had failed. If a man's good character is to avail him at all, when does he need it more than when a jury is deliberating upon the question whether he had formed in his mind the deliberate intent to take a human life? It might not have availed anything in this case; we are not considering the weight of the evidence upon this point; that was for the jury, but it should have been submitted to them in such manner as to give them a proper understanding as to how they should apply it.

We cannot treat this as an immaterial matter, which did not prejudice the defendant. It may not have done so, but we cannot say so. The issue of life and death is so vast, both as to this world and the next, that it is our duty to weigh every word carefully, and leave nothing to conjecture.

As the case must go back for another trial it is proper to say that we do not discover any error in the remaining assignments. The testimony of Dr. Reese, referred to in the first assignment, was properly rejected. It was not competent to prove the defendant's intoxication by showing the condition of Belford, who was with him, and had taken the same number of drinks. Some men can drink twice as much as others without showing it. The inquiry would have involved a collateral issue which might have confused if not misled the jury. The remaining assignments refer to the charge. With the single exception above noted we find no error in it.

Judgment reversed, and a venire facias de novo awarded.

COUNTY COURT OF KANAWHA
COUNTY et al.

(....W. Va....)

Taxes imposed by the county court for road purposes in a district under chapter 35, Acts 1881 (Code 1887, p. 838), are taxes assessed by "county authorities," within the meaning of § 7, art. 10, of the Constitution, and are to be included with other taxes levied by the county court, in determining whether the limit of taxation therein fixed will be exceeded.

(March 24, 1890.)

NOTE.—Taxation for road and highway purposes; in general.

The Legislature may compel the levy of a tax for the construction of a local road (Wilcox v. Deer Lodge County, 2 Mont. 574. See Re Woolsey, 96 N. Y. 186); but it cannot exercise directly the power of assessment for a local improvement in an incorporated city, regardless of the will of the local community. People v. Lynch, 51 Cal. 15; Schumacker v. Toberman, 50 Cal. 508.

The expense of public highways is usually provided for by the general town or county levy, except such important thoroughfares as are constructed by the State at large, and except also where contributions in labor are demanded for the purpose. Cooley, Taxn. 2d ed. 611; Miller v. Gorman, 83 Pa. 302.

The power to define the taxing district for any particular burden is purely legislative, subject to no restraint other than constitutional provisions. Shaw v. Dennis, 10 Ill. 405; *Conwell v. A PPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Circuit Court for Kanawha County in favor of complainant in a suit brought to enjoin the collection of a certain tax. Affirmed. The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Messrs. Brown & Jackson, for appellants:

The so-called "road tax" is not in fact a "tax," in the sense of the Constitution; but instead, is a local assessment authorized by the Legislature for local improvement; exercised under the police powers, which inherently exist in every government, to assess and collect from the localities benefited, the costs of the improvements made within its territorial limits.

This power and its exercise have been fully sustained by the courts whenever brought before them.

A tax on one community for the benefit of a larger community not taxed would be void. Ex parte Marshall, 64 Ala. 236.

And even though the work was wholly within the town, as in case of the erection of a costly bridge, the State or county might be determined by the Legislature as the proper taxing district. Will County v. People, 110 Ill. 511.

The State or the county is the proper taxing district for state or county roads, and the town will not be taxed for their cost of repair except as a part of the larger district in which it is located. People v. Dutchess County, 1 Hill, 50.

Where a city duly authorized thereto improves its own streets, a county tax for roads cannot be laid on its inhabitants. Martin v. Aston, 60 Cal. 63.

A tax levy may be made payable in labor, but this is to some extent a police regulation rather than a tax. Under a constitutional provision almost identical with § 7, art. 10, of our Constitution, the Supreme Court of Illinois expressly decided that the township road levies were not contemplated by said section, and, though when aggregated with the county levy the aggregate exceeded the limit fixed by the section, the levies were still valid.

Brannon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The District of Cabin Creek, in Kanawha County, adopted the Alternate Road Law provided by chapter 83, Acts 1891 (Code 1897, chap. 43, § 566). In 1889 the County Court of Kanawha County levied, for general county purposes, ninety-five cents on the $100 taxable property of the County, and, in addition thereto, thirty cents on the $100 of taxable property in Cabin Creek District, for road purposes in that district. P. L. Brannon, a taxpayer in said district, paid to the sheriff all his taxes save this tax levied for road purposes, which he refused to pay, and the sheriff, for its collection, levied upon property of said taxpayer; and he then, suing for himself, and all other taxpayers of the district, obtained an injunction restraining the sheriff from collecting this road tax, making the County Court and Roman Pickens, the sheriff, defendants to his bill, claiming in his bill, as the two levies together exceeded ninety-five cents on the $100 of taxable property, this road levy was illegal. The answers did not deny the facts alleged, but controverted the mere matter of law as to the illegality of the tax. Facts were agreed, and the cause was heard on the bill, answers, facts agreed, and on a motion to dissolve the injunction; and the decree was that the motion to dissolve be overruled, and the injunction perpetuated. The said County Court and Sheriff Pickens appealed to this court.

The ground on which the appellee, Brannon, bases his injunction is that the levy for county purposes of ninety-five cents, and that of thirty cents, under the Alternate Road Law of 1891 (Code 1897, chap. 43, p. 339), in the aggregate, exceed ninety-five cents on the $100 of property, and therefore the tax is in violation of § 7, art. 10, of the Constitution. That section is as follows: "County authorities shall never assess taxes, in any one year, the aggregate of which shall exceed ninety-five cents per $100 value-

What is the meaning of the words used in said section, "County authorities shall never assess taxes in any one year?" What taxes are here meant? Do these words refer only to taxes imposed for general county charges under the levy called "county levy," or do they mean these road taxes also? The language is broad and comprehensive,—“county authorities” and “taxes.” It seems to me that the Constitution contemplates four classes of taxes,—state, county, municipal and school-district taxes. Plainly, it contemplates state, county and municipal taxes, and I think, also, district taxes for education, since § 6, art. 13, provides for subdivision of counties into school districts, providing that “the school districts into which any county is now divided shall continue until changed in pursuance of law;” and section 5 of same article provides that the Legislature shall provide for raising in each county or district money for free schools; and § 8, art. 10, provides that no county, city, school district or municipal corporation shall incur debt except as prescribed. The Legislature has so construed the Constitution by creating the board of education of each district a corporation, and vesting it with power to tax for funds in its keeping, and for its distribution. So, I think, the Constitution contemplates district taxes for school purposes, as distinct from taxes assessed by county authorities. If so, we have state taxes, school-district taxes for schools and municipal taxes, but no other district taxes save those levied by the county authorities; and so I know not where we should rank these road taxes, if not as those assessed by county authorities, within the meaning of § 7, art. 10, above quoted,—not levied for general county charges, but by county authorities, though expended for works in the district. Besides those specified, there is no other taxing power.

The section in question says that county authorities shall never assess taxes in any one year, the aggregate of which shall exceed ninety five cents per $100, except for the support of free schools. If the Constitution contemplated only district taxation for school purposes the mere presence of this exception in the section would be of almost decisive import to show that the section included in its limitation of taxing power district taxes; but the fact that the Constitution contemplates local support for schools either by county or district tax detracts somewhat from the significance of this exception. Still, not without weight may it be said that, as both district and county taxation are allowed for schools, by the Constitution, this exception applies to both. Exceptions prove the rule. The fact that certain exceptions from this limitation are specified tends to show that all other taxes are meant to be included within the limitation. Another feature of this section 7 strikes me as significant of its meaning, and that is the presence of the word “aggregate,” the provision being that county authorities shall never assess taxes, “the aggregate of which shall exceed ninety-five cents per $100 valuation,” evidently meaning that more than one kind or species of taxes must be added together for the purposes of the limit of taxation here prescribed. What shall be added? Not charges for the many objects of expenditure which a county may incur, but classes or kinds of taxes. Take all this language, and the prohibition is broad.

But, in addition to the foregoing views, based only on the Constitution, let us examine the Act of the Legislature under which this question arises, that called the "Alternate Road Law," with a view to see what class of taxes we shall denominate the taxes imposed under it, and determine whether we should regard them as raised by "county authorities." It provides that the county court shall appoint three road surveyors in the district, and these surveyors shall report to the county the amount of money necessary to open and keep in repair the roads of the district, payable in the next year; and it is made the duty of the court to examine such report, and the estimates therein, and make such alterations and corrections therein as the court may see proper, and when it levies for the county debts and liabilities, to levy tax on the male inhabitants and property of the district liable for state and county purposes, which "shall be collected and disbursed in the same manner." Claims for work and other road expenses must be certified to the county court; and, if found correct, shall be allowed by the court, and paid, on order or warrant of the court, by the sheriff. The district lays no tax, nor does its board of surveyors. They allow no claims on the fund. All this is done by the county court. The court alters or corrects the estimate sent it by the surveyors. The tax is imposed upon the inhabitants and property of the district, and expended in the district; but it is estimated, laid and disbursed by the county court,—not by district authorities. The county courts, which are certainly county authorities, by § 24, art. 8, of the Constitution, have the superintendence and administration of the internal police and fiscal affairs of their counties, including the establishment and regulation of roads, etc. Thus, both the Constitution and this Statute place roads under the county authority; and it may be said these road taxes are under its authority, both under the power to regulate roads and under its power over the fiscal affairs of the county. I do not see that, because the roads are by the Legislature to be kept up by taxes levied in each district, for the roads therein, that it is any the less a tax levied by the county authorities, within the meaning of § 7, art. 10.

There is another view favoring this conclusion, and, in my opinion, a forcible view. The manifest design of the convention and people in adopting that section was to limit and restrict local taxation; a power very necessary to local administration, but one to be jealously guarded, and one often made the medium or instrument of burdensome exaction. It should be given a construction which will effectuate the end so plainly in view. Is it plausible to say that the Constitution would limit taxation for county purposes, and leave unlimited an equally dangerous taxation for district purposes? The county purpose has as much reason for an unlimited power of taxation as the district purpose, and more. This construction would distrust the county court as to the ordinary county levy, and trust it as to the levy for district purposes. On the opposite theory, keeping the poor, and other duties under present statutes performed by county courts, might be devolved on the districts, and minor duties left the courts; and, as district taxation is unlimited, the people might be ground down by taxation. The Constitution never intended to tolerate such a result. The provision under consideration is found in the Constitution under the chapter "Taxation and Finance." I think section 7 of article 10 was intended to protect the taxpayers against unlimited levy as to all taxes except state and school taxes, and taxes levied by municipal corporations. Municipal corporations, such as cities and towns, fall under section 9 of article 10, which provides that the Legislature may confer on them powers of taxation. Of course, their authorities are not county authorities, but municipal authorities, wielding to a certain extent powers of local government distilling them from counties and districts; and they are distinct therefrom,—have corporate existence unlike counties and districts, which are mere territorial subdivisions. I do not think that the provision that a proposition to levy beyond said limit must be submitted "to the vote of the people of the county" has force to rebut the construction I have expressed. If the levy is to affect the people of the entire county, the question must be submitted to all its people. If to affect those of a district only, it must be submitted to them. They are all people of the county, in a sense,—in the sense contemplated in the section. The major includes the minor. It is impossible to find language entirely exact and rigidly applicable in all contingencies. We must look at the reason and purpose, and apply the language to accomplish them. The construction contended for is too literal and narrow.

A decision of the Supreme Court of Illinois in the case of Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Mc-Clellan, 168 Ill. 888, is pressed upon our consideration for the appellant. Section 7, art. 10, of our Constitution is phrased like section 8, art. 9, of the Illinois Constitution, which reads: "County authorities shall never assess taxes, the aggregate of which shall exceed seventy-five cents per $100 valuation;" and our section 7 was borrowed from it. Decisions made by the Illinois court, before the adoption of our Constitution, construing this clause, would be authority to us; but this decision was in 1884, and is not binding authority. It holds that "town taxes levied for township purposes are not county taxes, within the meaning of § 8, art. 9, of the Constitution, prohibiting county authorities from assessing taxes the aggregate of which shall exceed seventy-five cents on the $100 of valuation, except for the payment of indebtedness existing at the adoption of that instrument. Such towns are municipal corporations, and taxes levied by them are for corporate purposes."

This case is not, however, in conflict with this view. The reason it held such taxes not county taxes, as stated in the syllabus, was that such towns are municipal corporations, and taxes levied by them are for corporate purposes. The judge delivering the opinion said: "The towns are municipal corporations, under the Township Organization Law, and these taxes were levied for corporate purposes. But appellant urges that the law does not authorize the levy of taxes for organized townships; that the law authorizing the levy and collection of taxes for towns refers to incorporated villages. To show that there is not the slightest ground for this objection, we have but to turn to almost any section of the Township Organization Law to see that such townships are called 'towns.' . . . The last clause of § 9, art. 9, of the Constitution, recognizes the power of the Legislature to authorize these bodies to levy and collect taxes for municipal purposes. This is the entire section: 'The General Assembly may vest the corporate authorities of cities, towns and villages with power to make local improvements by special assessment, or by special taxation of contiguous property, or otherwise. For all other corporate purposes, all municipal corporations may be vested with authority to assess and collect taxes, but such taxes shall be uniform in respect to persons and property within the jurisdiction of the body imposing the same.'"

This is just like § 9, art. 10, of our Constitution; and, were the tax here in question a tax levied by a municipal corporation, as in the Illinois case, I should reach the same opinion as that court did. There was another reason why that was not a tax assessed by "county authorities." The judge in the opinion gives as another reason for his conclusion the fact that the Illinois Statute required the clerk to estimate the rate per cent on the valuation of property in the several towns, townships, districts and incorporated cities and villages, to produce the amount certified to the county board as needed, and then required the clerk to extend the tax on the collector's book. The judge said: "Thus it is seen that it was not necessary that the board of supervisors should have made any levy of these municipal taxes. These sections impose the duty on the county clerk without any action on the part of the board. The order of the board in reference to these local taxes added nothing to, nor did it detract anything from, their validity. So, if anything more was needed to show these were not county taxes, this is conclusive of that question, as they are not levied by the board. They are levied by the town authorities, by filing their certificate of the amount required with the county clerk."

In West Virginia it is just the reverse as to these road taxes. The court alone levies them. If this decision is to be construed as justifying the Legislature in making what is not essentially a municipal corporation a municipal corporation, by simply calling it such, as, for instance, to make a mere political subdivision, like a district, a municipal corporation, and thus give it taxing power not limited by said § 7, art. 10, we do not approve it. See the later Illinois case of Wright v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 120 Ill. 641, 9 West. Rep. 744.

The question of the constitutionality of this Road Statute has been argued. When that Statute says that road taxes shall be levied, and gives no limit, it must be taken that it means that they shall be levied within the constitutional limit. The county court must have an eye to that limit, and so apportion the assessment as will, in their judgment, best answer the public interest, but must keep within the limit; and, if that be not adequate for public wants, all that can be said is, "So the Constitution is written." I think that § 7, art. 10, has the function of limiting all taxes levied in a county except school taxes, and those of municipal corporations.

It is argued that this road tax is not a tax. It has all the features, qualities and elements of a tax, and is called a tax in the Statute which imposes it. Taxes are defined as being "the enforced proportional contributions of persons and property, levied by the authority of the State, for the support of the government, and for all public needs. They are the property of the citizen, demanded and received by the government, to be disposed of to enable it to carry into effect its mandates, and to discharge its manifold functions." Cooley, Tax, 1.

"They are burdens or charges imposed by the legislative power of a State upon persons or property to raise money for public purposes." Blackw. Tax Titles, 1.

This road tax is certainly a tax.

Letters-patent may be sold and transferred by a court of equity through its master for the benefit of creditors of their owner under Stat. 1854, chap. 285, even although he is a non-resident of the State, if the court has acquired jurisdiction which will enable it to bind him with a personal judgment.

(W. Allen and Field, JJ., dissent.)

(June 17, 1890.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Suffolk County in favor of complainant in a suit brought to reach certain letters-patent belonging to defendant and apply them to the payment of its debt. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Mears George Putnam and R. D. Weston-Smith for appellant.
Mr. Frank T. Bannor for appellee.

Knowlton, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

This case has previously been before us on the defendant's demurrer, and it was decided that the demurrer should be overruled, and that the service was sufficient to enable the court to render a personal judgment against the Company, which would be held good in any other jurisdiction as well as in this. 149 Mass. 24. A hearing has since been had, and the case now comes here on an appeal from the final decree. The defendant concedes that all parts of the decree are well warranted by the law and the facts, except that part which provides that, if the defendant shall refuse or neglect to make and deliver a written assignment of the letters-patent to the purchaser after a sale at public auction by the master under the decree, the master shall "make and deliver such assignment to said purchaser in the name and on behalf of the defendant corporation."

Two objections are made to this part of the decree: first, that an order for a sale of property by a master or other person appointed for that purpose can be made by a court of equity only under the authority of a statute and that there is no statute which authorizes it in this case; secondly, that a patent right is property of such a nature that the title cannot be passed by a sale or assignment made under an order of the court by any other person than the owner, even if it were in other respects within the jurisdiction of the court to make such an order.

It is undoubtedly true that, primarily, jurisdiction in equity is in personam, and that as a general rule, when a transfer of property is necessary, the court cannot order a conveyance of it by a person other than the owner, except under the express or implied authority of a statute.

The foundation of the jurisdiction to which the plaintiff appeals is the Statute of 1851, chap. 206 (Pub. Stat. chap. 151, § 2, cl. 11), which authorizes "bills by creditors to reach and apply any property, right, title or interest, legal or equitable, of a debtor within this State, which cannot be come at to be attached or taken on execution in a suit at law against such debtor." This Statute was passed long before the courts of this State were given general jurisdiction in equity, and it was early interpreted as creating rights unknown to the courts of chancery in England. It was held that a suit under it was not like an ordinary creditor's bill, but that any creditor might proceed without making other creditors parties, and without first obtaining judgment, and while he held security, and that it gave him right of equitable attachment for the collection of his debt. Orompton v. Anthony, 18 Allen, 28, 37; Barry v. Abbot, 100 Mass. 296; Tucker v. McDonald, 105 Mass. 423.

In some particulars the court construed it rather strictly, and held that a patent right owned by a resident here was not property within the State within the meaning of the Statute, and that a creditor could not, under this process, reach and apply an equitable remainder of the debtor in a trust fund, upon the future debt of an equitable tenant for life, nor any other property when his claim was for less than $100, and intimated that the Statute would not apply except in cases where there was a third person in possession or control of the property of the debtor, or in some way under obligation to him. Carver v. Peck, 181 Mass. 291; Chapman v. Banker & T. Pub. Co. 148 Mass. 478; Russell v. Milton, 133 Mass. 180; Bartholomew v. Weld, 127 Mass. 210; Phania Ins. Co. v. Abbott, 127 Mass. 558.

Thereupon the Statute of 1884, chap. 285, was passed with a view to enlarge the jurisdiction of the court. Section 1 of this chapter is as follows: "A bill in equity may be maintained to reach and apply in payment of a debt any property of a debtor, as provided by cl. 11 of § 2 of chap. 151 of the Public Statutes, notwithstanding the fact that the plaintiff's debt does not equal $100 in amount, or that the property sought to be reached and applied is in the hands, possession or control of the debt or independently of any other person, or that it is not within the State, or that it is of uncertain value, provided the value can be ascertained by a sale or appraisal, or by any means within the ordinary procedure of the court, or that it cannot be reached and applied until a future time." Section 9 relates to suits to reach and apply the interest of a copartner in the partnership property.

The provisions of this Act indicate an intention on the part of the Legislature to give the court power effectually to reach and apply every kind of property which cannot be attached or taken on execution. It changes the Statute from a mere authority to make an equitable attachment of property in the hands of an equitable trustee, and authorizes proceedings in which there is no other defendant but the debtor, and plainly implies that the court may make all such orders and take such measures as may be necessary to apply the property to the payment of the debt. There can be no doubt that under it a court may proceed against an absent defendant so far as to appropriate his equitable interest in property in this State, which cannot be attached or taken on execution, to the payment of his debt. The only way in which that could be done in his absence might be by appointing some person to sell and convey such interest. The Act does not purport to point out the modes of procedure, but it authorizes the courts to do certain things which they could not do under their general jurisdiction, and impliedly authorizes them to take any measures analogous to ordinary proceedings of courts of equity which may be necessary or proper to accomplish the work which they are sent to do. We can imagine many cases in which without authority to order a sale by a master or other person, a court would fail utterly to reach and apply the property which the Statute intended it should apply in favor of the creditor. Indeed the present case seems to be such a one. For it appears that when this bill was brought the president and treasurer and all the directors of the defendant corporation resided or had their places of business in Boston in this Commonwealth, and that all these officers have since resigned their offices and others have been elected in their places, who are all residents of the State of Maine.

One clause of the Statute distinctly refers to a sale of property as a means of ascertaining its value under an order of the court in certain cases. It has never been decided that a sale by a master might not be ordered under the Public Statutes, chap. 181, § 2, cl. 11, and some of the reports indicate that it has been done. Davis v. Warden, 18 Gray, 306.

However that may be, we are of opinion that under the later Statute there is authority to make a sale in that way, whenever it may be necessary for the purpose of applying property, conformably to the Statute. This view is in accordance with our decision in McCann v. Bondall, 147 Mass. 81.

The next question before us is, whether a patent right so differs from other property that it cannot be sold in this way. This question relates merely to the form of transfer; for it is well settled that a court of equity has power to take it and appropriate it to the payment of the owner's debt. Outlett v. Bate, 86 N. Y. 87; Agar v. Murray, 105 U. S. 136 [26 L. ed. 942]; Pacific Bank v. Robinson, 87 Cal. 800; Wilson v. Martin-Wilson Automatic Fire Alarm Co., 140 Mass. 34.

Under the Revised Statutes of the United States, § 4594, every patent "shall contain a grant to the patentee, his heirs or assigns."

Section 4808, provides that "every patent or any interest therein shall be assignable in law by an instrument in writing."

An assignment in bankruptcy transfers patent rights. U. S. Rev. Stat.

There is no good reason for holding that this Statute should be construed so strictly as to require an assignment to be made by the patentee's own hand. It is better to hold that an assignment made for him and in his name by anyone acting under legal authority is good, notwithstanding the decisions in Ashcroft v. Walworth, 1 Holmes, C. C. 152, and Gordon v. Anthony, 16 Blatchf. 284. We understand this to be the effect of the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States in Agar v. Murray, supra. We are therefore of the opinion the assignment contemplated by this decree will be good in form under the Statutes of the United States.

It is said that the assignment will be void because a patent is property outside of this Commonwealth which cannot be affected by a judicial sale here. It is true that a judgment or a decree of a court cannot as proprio rigore affect property in another jurisdiction. Titles to real estate can be changed only under and in accordance with the laws of the country where the land is situated; and a decree of a foreign court in regard to personal property can be given no effect against the rights or interests of citizens of the State where the property is situated, nor any effect at all except through comity. Is a patent right property of such a kind, and has it such a situs in any particular State, that the courts of one State can disregard a decree determining the ownership of it, made by a court of another State having jurisdiction of the owner of it, and a right to apply it to the payment of his debt? Carrar v. Peck, 181 Mass. 201, and Stroms v. Gladding, 88 U. S. 17 How. 461 [16 L. ed. 166], indicate that it is not.

It seems to us that the rule to which we have referred relates to visible, tangible property, which a State may say is to be governed by its laws, because it has an actual, visible existence there and not elsewhere—perhaps also to property which cannot be made available except by proceedings under its laws. A patent right is not like a material substance. So far as it has location at all, it is within every part of the United States. But it has no such location anywhere that a particular State can say, "This property is within my jurisdiction. I will not allow any other State to deal with it, but I will control it by my own laws for the benefit of my own people." The reason why ordinary choses in action are usually said to be governed by the law of the place of their owner's domicile is not because they have a local situs to themselves, but because they follow the person of their owner, and that place is con-merely the only one whose courts have jurisdiction over him.

In the case at bar the defendant was subject to the jurisdiction of the court as much as if it had been a Massachusetts corporation. The right of the court to determine the equitable ownership of the patent, as between the defendant and the plaintiff, is unquestioned. The jurisdiction which settles that is strictly in personam. The decree requires the defendant to assign the patent, which is an incorporeal right to be exercised in Massachusetts and elsewhere, and which the corporation carried with it when it went into court on the summons of the plaintiff, and which has no local existence except as it accompanies its owner. The subject matter of the suit was the question as to the ownership of the patent, and as to the duty of the defendant to turn it over to the plaintiff. The decree of the court finding such ownership against a defendant within its jurisdiction, and determining that the property should be transferred for the benefit of the plaintiff, showed jurisdiction in the court to convey the legal title to this peculiar property, which it would not have had to convey an ordinary chattel situated in another State. If in a case of this kind a debtor should refuse to convey the property in accordance with its decree, the court could imprison him. A sale by a master under the order of the court is also authorized by our Statute. The law which has power over a debtor's person has power to determine how and on what conditions a right of his shall be divested, unless the right has relation to tangible property within the jurisdiction of another State which may intervene to control it. It is on this ground, but under a different Statute, that sales are made on executions. Such sales are not founded on proceedings in rem which determine the title to the res against all the world. But when a court has jurisdiction of a debtor and finds that he owes the debt, the Statute authorizes the issuing of an execution under which his rights in property, whatever they are, may be sold for the benefit of his creditors. The sale is incidental to the determination of his liability.

We are of opinion that other States have no such jurisdiction over the defendant's patent as to affect the validity of a decree which confessedly is good so far as it directs a sale to be made by him, and which would be unquestioned if it related to property wholly within this Commonwealth. This question too, or one much like it, is involved, although but little discussed, in the judgment in Ayer v. Murray, supra.

Decree affirmed.

W. Allen, J., dissenting:

Mr. Justice Field and myself are unable to concur in the decision of the court which affirms that clause of the decree which orders an assignment of the patent to be made by a master. The decree assumes that the court has authority to transfer the title to the patent by decree, for it is immaterial whether the decree directly transfers the title or authorizes a master to do so by a written assignment. The suit is not brought by an owner of property to establish his title to it, and obtain possession of it, but it rests upon the ground that the defendant is the owner, and seeks to effect a change of title.

The ordinary jurisdiction of a court of chancery is in personam and not in rem, and it is not in accordance with the ordinary procedure of the court to act directly upon property and to transfer the title to it. Whatever authority the court may have to order the payment over or the sale and delivery of property which passes by delivery and is under the control of the court in the manual possession of its sequestrators or receivers or master, so that delivery can be made of it, it cannot transfer or assign a chose in action or an incorporeal right, or change the title to any property by decree without special statute authority. This was fully discussed in the dissenting opinion in McCann v. Randall, 147 Mass. 81, and is assumed in the opinion of the court in this case, and the authority for the decree is vested on the provision of Stat. 1854, chap. 285, in connection with the earlier Statutes of which that was an amendment. The only question I shall consider is whether that Statute authorized the decree. The question was not decided in McCann v. Randall, supra, and that case did not decide that the draft which was the property sought to be reached could be assigned by the court. The defendant Manning, in whose possession and control the draft was, within the State, sent it, in disobedience of the injunction of the court, to the principal defendant, the debtor, without the State, in order that he might indorse and collect it; which he did, paying to Manning the amount of a lien he had upon it. Defendant Manning was ordered to pay the amount of the draft less the amount of his lien upon it. In considering whether Stat. 1854, chap. 285, authorized the court to assign a chose in action, it is important to look at the history of the Statute. In 1831 the supreme judicial court was, as now, a court of equity, and as such had jurisdiction of the redemption and foreclosure of mortgages, of trusts, of the specific performance of contracts, of the delivery of goods secured, etc., of contribution, of cases where more than two parties were liable; of copartnerships, joint tenancies, etc.; of waste and nuisance, of discovery and of account (Rev. Sta. chap. 81, § 7, chap. 118, § 43), and also of twelve other particular matters which are stated in the index to the Revised Statutes under "Bill in Equity." All this jurisdiction it had had for fifteen years, and it also had during all that time an established procedure under "Rules for the Regulation of Practice in Chancery," the last of which adopted as the outline of their practice the practice of the High Court of Chancery in England, so far as not repugnant to the Constitution and laws of the Commonwealth and the rules of the court. 24 Pick. 410.

The jurisdiction was enlarged by Stat. 1833, chap. 104, to include frauds and conveyances of real estate in the nature of mortgages, and by Stat. 1836, chap. 38, to include accident and mistake, and by Stat. 1857, chap. 214, "full equity jurisdiction, according to the usage and practice of courts of chancery," was given to the court. These Statutes enlarging the equity jurisdiction of the court did not change the procedure in equity. In 1851 this court was as distinctively a court of equity having an established procedure as it is to day.

Jurisdiction in equity was given in order that the subjects should be brought under the distinctive procedure and process of courts of equity, and to secure the relief which such procedure and process afforded. It was for precisely this purpose that the Statute giving jurisdiction in equity to reach and apply property of debtors was first enacted in 1851. The creditor's bill was unknown to our jurisprudence; there was but little occasion for it. The distribution of the estates of deceased and of insolvent persons was otherwise provided for. The law provided for taking and selling on execution all the property of a debtor which could be taken on process and which it was intended should be liable for his debts, and by the trustee process, goods, effects or credits in the hands of third persons might be reached by proceedings against such persons. In regard to property which could not be taken on execution or attached on trustee process, and which belonged to debtors living in this State, the law furnished substantially the same means as were furnished by a creditor's bill to reach such property, namely, the punishment of the debtor by imprisonment if he did not surrender the property. Rev. Stat. chaps. 90, 98.

There were no means of reaching such property in this Commonwealth which belonged to debtors who were not residents and could not be served with process here. It was to meet this particular mischief in the old law which gave to foreign debtors owning equitable property here an advantage over domestic debtors owning such property, that Stat. 1851, chap. 208, was passed. Davis v. Warden, 18 Gray, 505.

The language of the Statute is: "The supreme judicial court shall have jurisdiction in equity, upon bill of any creditor to reach and apply, in payment of a debt due from any debtor not residing in this Commonwealth, any property, right, title or interest, legal or equitable, of such debtor, within this Commonwealth, which cannot be come at to be attached or taken on execution in a suit of law against such debtor." The property of a non-resident described by the Statute as within this State would naturally, if not necessarily, be in the possession or legal ownership of a resident here, and the intent of the Statute in giving jurisdiction in equity was that the property might be reached through such person by proceedings in personam against him. As originally passed, the Statute is plainly what it has been again and again called by this court, an equitable trustee process and intended only equitable proceedings, and it is impossible to find in it any intention to change the ordinary procedure of the court. It is not and cannot be contended that this Statute gave the court authority to assign a patent. Statute 1858, chap. 84, amended Stat. 1851, chap. 208, by striking out the words "not residing in this Commonwealth," thus making the Act apply to resident and nonresident debtors alike; and, as amended, the Statute was re-enacted in Gen. Stat., chap. 113, § 2, cl. 11, and in Pub. Stat., chap. 151, § 2, cl. 11, and remained unchanged until Stat. 1884, chap. 285.

The question is whether that Statute changed the procedure of the court of equity as regards its subject matter and authorized the court to assign a chose in action or incorporeal right. The amendment made by Stat. 1858, chap. 84, which was after the enactment of the Statute giving the court full equity jurisdiction, suggests two important changes in the Statute as originally enacted and as construed by the court. The fact that in the original Act the principal defendant, the debtor, could not be a resident of this Commonwealth, and need not be, and presumably would not be, served with process, and that the property which by the Act was to be reached by proceedings in equity must be within the Commonwealth, and by its nature and situation such that it could not be come at to be attached or taken on execution, naturally led to the construction that there must be some third person within the jurisdiction of the court holding such relation to the property that it could be reached by a personal decree against him.

When by the Amendment of 1858, a debtor residing in the State was made amenable to the suit, the chief ground for that construction was taken away. He must be served with process and be actually or constructively in court. If it appeared that he held in his own possession or control property not exempt from execution, but which could not be come at to be taken on process, it could be reached by the ordinary procedure of a court of equity requiring him to transfer it, and this whether the property were within or without this Commonwealth, and it would be carrying out the general intent of the Statute to authorize the court to enter such a decree. Notwithstanding this Statute the court seemed to hold to the equitable trustee-process construction of the Act (Phenix Ins. Co. v. Abbott, 127 Mass. 538), and of course the court could not extend the Act limited in terms to property within the State, to apply to property without the State. When the Statute was made applicable to residents of the State it became in accordance with the principles and procedure of the courts of equity that it should be extended to property in the hands of the debtor, and to property without the State, because he could be compelled to assign it and it was thus within the reach of a court of equity. This is what was done by Statute 1884, chap. 285, § 1.

It provided that a bill might be maintained under Pub. Stat., chap. 153, § 2, cl. 11, notwithstanding the fact that the property sought to be reached was in the hands, possession or control of the debtor independently of any other person, or that it was not within the State. The Legislature, by extending the scope of the Statute after it had been made to apply to debtors within the State to property in the possession of the debtor, and to property without the jurisdiction of the court, gave a jurisdiction to which a decree in personam is especially appropriate, and a decree in rem especially inappropriate. The other provisions of the section do not seem material to the question under consideration. It will not be contended that the provision that a bill can be maintained although the property is of uncertain value "provided the value can be ascertained by a sale or appraisal or by any means within the ordinary procedure of the court," authorizes an assignment by the court of a chose in action contrary to the ordinary procedure of the court. It seems to me that the Statute evidently contemplated equitable remedies by decree in personam. If the Statute is to be construed as authorizing a judicial assignment of the title of property which does not pass by delivery it would not justify the decree, because the property in question is not within the Commonwealth, and the decree affects to transfer the title to property outside the jurisdiction of the Legislature and of the courts of this State, and the Statute will not be construed to imply such authority. No question is made of the authority of the court to compel the owner of a patent to assign it to a receiver or a master appointed to receive it, or to a purchaser under the order of the court. The objection is that the court cannot itself by decree transfer the title, for the reason that the patent is not within its jurisdiction. If a patent, according to the general rule of personal property, followed the domicile of its owner, the patent in question would be in the State of Maine, for the owner is a corporation under the laws of that State, and though it may by its agent do business and sue and be sued in other States it cannot change its domicile, nor even pass personally out of the State of its creation. Augusta Bank v. Earle, 25 U. S. 13 Pet. 819 (10 L. ed. 274); Lafayette Ins. Co. v. French, 80 U. S. 18 How. 404 (15 L. ed. 451).

If the patent has no locality except the whole country no State has jurisdiction over it as being properly within its limits, and it can only be reached through the personal act of its owner. A State might indeed by statute order it to be sold on execution or under a decree in chancery and declare the title to be in the purchaser, but such sale would have no more effect outside of the limits of the State than the sale of land in another State would have.

In Morris v. Udding, 55 U. S. 17 How. 451 (15 L. ed. 156), Mr. Justice Curtis said in reference to patents and copyrights: "Not to repeat what is said in Stephens v. Oddy, 55 U. S. 14 How. 551 (14 L. ed. 529), it may be added that these incorporeal rights do not exist in any particular State or district; they are co-extensive with the United States. There is nothing in any Act of Congress or in the nature of the rights themselves, to give them locality anywhere, so as to subject them to process of courts having jurisdiction limited by the lines of States and districts. That an execution out of the Court of Common Pleas for the County of Bristol in the State of Massachusetts can be levied on an incorporeal right in Rhode Island or New York, will hardly be pretended. That by the way of such an execution the entire right could be divided, and so much of it as might be exercised within the County of Bristol sold, would be a position subject to much difficulty."

Mr. Justice Gray says, in Agar v. Murray, 105 U. S. 130 (26 L. ed. 943), after quoting the above language: "The difficulties of which the learned justice here speaks are of seizing and selling a patent or copyright upon an execution at law, which is ordinarily levied only upon the property, or the rents and profits of property, that has itself a visible and tangible existence within the jurisdiction of the court, and the precinct of the officer, and do not attend decrees of a court of equity which are in personam, and may be enforced in all cases when the person is within its jurisdiction."

It is obvious that it can make no difference as respects the jurisdiction of a State, whether it orders an assignment on an execution of law, or on a decree in equity; the dominion over the property and the assumption of jurisdiction over it are the same in both instances. If it cannot sell and assign it upon process at law, it cannot upon process in equity.

In Carr v. Peck, 131 Mass. 201, it was held that a patent owned by a resident of this Commonwealth was not property within the State and could not be reached, and the Statute of 1884, extending the jurisdiction to property without the State, was passed. Under that Statute jurisdiction is given, in this case, to compel the defendant to assign the patent (see Wilson v. Martin-Wilson Automatic Fire Alarm Co., 149 Mass. 25); but the court cannot assume jurisdiction to judicially assign it without overruling the opinion in Carr v. Peck, and holding that a patent is property within the State. If there was not jurisdiction over the property, before the amendment, for the reason that the property was not within the State, there can be no jurisdiction over the property as within the State after the amendment.

If a patent has location in every part of the United States so that no one State has jurisdiction over it by reason of its locality to the exclusion of other States, and every State has equal jurisdiction over it and an equal right to appropriate it to the benefit of its own citizens as every other State, it follows that no State has jurisdiction over the patent itself, and no State can reach it except through the person of the owner of someone duly authorized by him to assign it. Otherwise there must be legally possible as many different lawful assignors besides the owner as there are States and Territories or judicial districts in the United States. The rights of the States by reason of the locality of the patent are equal, and if any one State has jurisdiction to appropriate it because within its limits every other State must have the same jurisdiction, and as that is impossible, it follows that no State can have the jurisdiction. The fact that the property is incorporeal and intangible and has no visible existence makes it possible to conceive of it as existing in the whole country and in every State; but we cannot conceive of the whole patent in its entirety as having its locality in the whole country and in the several States at the same time. The fact that the property is immaterial and has no actual visible location, certainly cannot aid the jurisdiction over it, which is dependent upon its locality. The State cannot have jurisdiction over it except so far as it is within the State, and so far as the patent is within other States it is not within this State.

Again, the Statute will not be construed to give authority to the court to assign patent rights, and the court will not decree an assignment of them, because the title would not pass by such an assignment. A patent right is assignable only because expressly made so by the Statute which created it, and in the manner prescribed by the Statute. The assignment must be by an instrument in writing by the patentee or his assigns or legal representatives, and it will be void as against subsequent purchasers without notice unless recorded in the patent office within three months from its date. U. S. Rev. Stat. § 4898.

The natural construction of this is that a patent cannot be assigned, and that no state law can make it assignable, in any other way than the one prescribed.

In Stephens v. Cady, 55 U. S. 14 How. 528 [14 L. ed. 528], speaking of copyrights, Mr. Justice Nelson said: "No doubt the property may be reached by a creditor's bill and be applied to the payment of the debts of the author, the same as stock of the debtor is reached and applied for the benefit of the creditors. But in the case of such remedy we suppose it would be necessary for the court to compel a transfer to the purchaser in conformity with the requirements of the Copyrights Act, in order to invest him with a complete title to the property."

In Ashcroft v. Walworth, 1 Holmes, C. C. 163, it was decided that the Statute "clearly contemplated a written assignment signed by the owner of the patent," and that a court of insolvency of Massachusetts, to vest the title to a patent in the assignee, must compel a transfer in conformity with requirements of the Patent Act.

In Gordan v. Anthony, 16 Blatchf. 234, the same construction of the Statute was adopted, and it was held that a state court could not vest the title to a patent in a receiver except by compelling an assignment by the patentee.

In Pacific Bank v. Robinson, 87 Cal. 520, the court said of a patent: "As a creation of legislation it is transferable only according to the provisions of the Statute which created it, and the only question is, Has a court of equity power to compel its assignment and sale for the benefit of creditors?"

The decree required the defendant to transfer by a proper instrument. I see no reason for supposing that the patent office, or any United States court or any state court, outside of the State whose court made the decree, would recognize a transfer of a patent by decree of a state court.

Ager v. Murray, 106 U. S. 126 [26 L. ed. 949], is the only case where an assignment of a patent was ordered to be made by a trustee, and that case decided nothing as to the form of the decree. That was a bill brought in the courts of the District of Columbia against residents of the District. The prayer of the bill was that the patent be sold and the defendant be required to execute an assignment to the purchaser in conformity with the Patent Laws. The decree was that in default of payment of the amount found due, the patent right be sold and an assignment executed as prayed for, and in default of defendant's executing such assignment, some suitable person be appointed a trustee to execute the same. This was the form of decree authorized by the Statute of Maryland of 1785, chap. 73, which was in force in the District of Columbia. The defendants appealed from the decree. The court says: "The single question argued before us is whether a patent right may be ordered by a court of equity to be sold, and the proceeds applied to the payment of a judgment debt of the patentee." It was decided that it could be sold, but the manner in which it was understood by the court that it could be transferred appears in the extract before given from the opinion and from the reference to the case of Stephens v. Cady. The court, after reciting the facts, says: "The case is thus brought directly within the opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Nelson in Stephens v. Cady, of the soundness of which we entertain no doubt. The clause of the decree below, appointing a trustee to execute an assignment, if the patentee shall not himself execute one, has not been objected to in the argument, and was clearly within the chancery powers of the court as defined in the Statute of Maryland."

The decree of the court below was affirmed. I do not regard the case as deciding that there could be a valid assignment of a patent by a decree of a state court, where the defendant is a resident of the State and its statutes expressly authorize such a decree,—much less when the defendant is a nonresident, and there is no such statute of the State.

There can be no doubt that an assignment by the defendant in person would be recognized everywhere, unless in our own court. If the defendant should assign by an instrument duly recorded to a bona fide purchaser for value in Maine, and the question of the title to the patent should come before our courts between him and a subsequent purchaser and assignee under the decree of the court, I do not see why our courts would not have to declare the title they made to be invalid. The court has no control over the property, and no lien or hold upon it. It is not and never has been in the possession of the court, for the appearance in the suit of a foreign corporation by its attorney or agent does not bring its property into court. All that the court can do is to restrain the defendant from assigning, but if it should assign, in contempt of the restraint, to a bona fide purchaser, I understand that the assignment would be good. The court has not obtained possession of the property, nor of the letters patent, the evidence and symbol of it; and if it attempts to assign the property, it must do so without the possession of it, actual or constructive, and without the means of knowing, except so far as the records in the patent office may show, whether it then belongs to the defendant. It can make no delivery of the property, or of any symbol of it; all that it can do is to give to the purchaser an instrument, in form an assignment, from a person not the owner and send him to the patent office to have his assignment recorded. But if it is entitled to record, so would be the forty like assignments from the States, which might be presented. If record was refused, would any court compel the recording of such assignments? And if they should all be recorded, how would it be determined which was the one valid assignment? And if that were found, would it hold good against a prior or a subsequent assignment from the owner, duly recorded, or even if not recorded? The answer is that no assignment is valid except by an instrument in writing signed by the owner as required by the Statute.

For the reasons that the clause of the decree which orders the master to make an assignment in behalf of the defendant is not warranted by the ordinary procedure of courts of equity, and is not authorized by the Statute, because the Statute does not authorize such an assignment of a chose in action, nor of property without the Commonwealth, nor of a patent right, I think the decree should be modified by striking out that clause.

Whether the decree should be further modified by ordering an assignment to a master before the sale, has not been considered.

1. A grantee who assumes and agrees to pay, as part of the purchase price of land, a mortgage which his grantor has given thereon, thereby undertakes to discharge the mortgagee's lien upon the land and not simply to cancel the mortgage debt so far as it is a claim against individuals, and his failure to do so will render him liable to at least nominal damages.

2. If several mortgages are so assumed and the grantee fails to pay the one first due and permits it to be foreclosed and the property sold for its payment, he will be liable in damages to his grantor for the latter's loss of security against liability upon subsequent mortgages up to the amount of debts secured by them, even though they are not yet due.

3. A set-off cannot be allowed under Pub. Stat., chap. 163, §§ 3-5, in an action brought to recover unliquidated damages for a breach of contract, of a claim which is of the same kind as that to recover which the action is brought.

(Manuscript June 27, 1889. Opinions July 14, 1890.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Franklin County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for breach of contract to pay a certain mortgage. Affirmed.

Plaintiff made a deed of certain land to defendant, excepting therein from the covenant against incumbrances two mortgages for $1,200 and $500 respectively, immediately followed by the clause "which mortgages the said Sanders assumes and agrees to pay."

The $1,200 mortgage was payable on demand. Nothing would become due on the $500 mortgage until January 1, 1890. On June 8, 1889, the first mortgagee sold the premises under his mortgage for $1,800. This action was brought June 4, 1889, to recover damages for loss of security to meet and cover the $500 mortgage.

The case further appears in the opinion.

Mr. Sidney Sanders, appellant, in propria persona:

If the premises had sold for enough to pay both mortgages and all expenses, the proceeds

NOTE.—Mortgagor may convey premises subject to mortgage debt.

A mortgagor has always the right to convey his land subject to the mortgage. Northrup v. Hotenstein, 38 Kan. 262.

Where a purchaser of premises assumes the payment of a mortgage as part of the purchase money, the premises purchased are the primary fund for the payment of the debt, and it is his duty to pay it. Drury v. Holden, 9 West. Rep. 789, 121 Ill. 130; Lilly v. Palmer, 51 Ill. 551; Russell v. Pistor, 7 N. Y. 171.

And the rule is the same, although there can be no such assumption if the purchase be made expressly subject to the incumbrance. Drury v. Holden, supra; Comstock v. Hitt, 37 Ill. 545; Fowler v. Fay, 48 Ill. 376; Farris v. Crawford, 2 Denio, 598.

In paying off the mortgage he simply performs the condition, subject to which he succeeded to the mortgage estate. Knowles v. Carpenter, 3 R. L. 552; Farris v. Crawford, supra; Cumberland v. Codrington, 3 Johns. Ch. 222; Waring v. Ward, 7 Ves. Jr. 382.

The obligation of the purchaser when he assumes the debt inures in equity to the benefit of the mortgagee and may be enforced in a bill to foreclose his mortgage. Crawford v. Edwards, 13 Mich. 202.

Or the mortgagee may maintain a personal action against him without foreclosing the mortgage and without joining the mortgagor as defendant. Burr v. Boers, 24 N. Y. 179; *Curtis v. A special agreement between the purchaser and the seller of the equity of redemption, by which the amount of the mortgage debt is considered as so much money left in the hands of the purchaser for the use of the mortgagee, would be sufficient ground for a suit at law by the mortgagee. Garnsey v. Rogers, 47 N. Y. 226; Real Estate Trust Co. v. Balch, 12 Jones & S. 534; Higman v. Stewart, 28 Mich. 422.

A purchaser of the equity of redemption by merely accepting without signing the deed, providing he "assumes and agrees to pay" the mortgage debt, is personally liable therefor; and after foreclosure a court of equity will enforce his liability for any deficiency, by subrogating the mortgagee to the contract made by the mortgagor. Davis v. Hulst, 2 New Eng. Rep. 122, 58 Vt. 50; Schley v. Fryer, 1 Cent. Rep. 5, 100 N. Y. 71.

Grantor must be personally liable.

The covenant by the grantee to pay the mortgage debt will support an action by the mortgagee only when the immediate grantor of the covenantor is himself liable for the mortgage debt. Wilbur v. Warren, 3 Cent. Rep. 214, 104 N. Y. 122.

Where a grantor of an equity of redemption in mortgaged premises is not personally liable to pay the mortgage debt, and has no legal or equitable interest in such payment, except so far as the mortgage may be a charge upon the lands mortgaged, his grantee thereof incurs no liability to the holder of the mortgage by reason of a covenant on his part contained in the deed, to assume and pay the mortgage. *Vrooman v. There was never any breach of the defendant's alleged contract.

Plaintiff's whole claim is barred by his covenant to warrant and defend. This covenant is not simply a covenant real, but a personal contract with all the incidents of personal contract (Cole v. Raymond, 9 Gray, 317-319), and estops or rebuts the plaintiff from setting up any title, or, the same thing, claims based on titles, adverse to what he has conveyed and warranted to the defendant.

Brown v. Skinner, 3 Pick. 52; Knight v. Thayer, 135 Mass. 25; Bates v. Norcross, 17 Pick. 14.

Mr. S. T. Field for appellee.

Knowlton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By accepting his deed from the plaintiff, the defendant assumed and agreed to pay two mortgages, of which one was then over due, and the other was payable by installments to become due in the future. It was a single but divisible contract, containing a promise, first, to pay one mortgage immediately, and secondly, to pay the other when it should become due. In proceedings to recover damages for a breach of the contract, each part of it should be considered separately. It is agreed that there has been no breach as to the second mortgage, and damages can be recovered in this action only for neglect to assume and pay the first mortgage. The plaintiff claims damages of two kinds: first, those resulting from the defendant's failure to relieve him from personal liability on the mortgage debt, and secondly, those growing out of the defendant's neglect to obtain a discharge of the first mortgage, whereby the plaintiff has been deprived of a benefit which should have resulted to his security for the payment of the second mortgage. If he can recover only for the failure to relieve him from liability on the mortgage debt, the damage should be only nominal; for before the suit was brought, the mortgage was foreclosed, and the debt was paid from the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged property. If, on the other hand, he can recover on account of the defendant's neglect to do that which would have worked a discharge of the first mortgage, it does not appear that the assessment was erroneous. Our decision, therefore, must depend upon whether a grantee in 12 N. Y. 80; Biddell v. Brimolara, 44 Cal. 381; Cumberland v. Codrington, 2 Johns. Ch. 302.

Though the assumption of the mortgage debt by the subsequent purchaser is absolute and unqualified in the deed of conveyance, it will be controlled by a collateral contract made between him and his grantor, which is not embodied in the deed. Flagg v. Munger, 9 N. Y. 481.

And it will not in any case be available to the mortgagee, unless the grantor was himself personally liable for the payment of the mortgage debt. Crowell v. St. Barnabas Hospital, 27 N. J. Eq. 320.

In such case the promise of the purchaser is held to be a nudum pactum, and, of course, without efficacy in favor of either the grantor or mortgagee. Crowell v. Currier, 27 N. J. Eq. 154; Norwood v. De Hart, 20 N. J. Eq. 414; Brewer v. Maurer, 28 Ohio St. 392.

The mortgagee cannot look to the grantee, personally, at all; because the assumption is but an indemnity, and the grantor not being liable, the indemnity is practically a mere nullity. Mount v. Van Ness, 23 N. J. Eq. 265.

To make the promise of a grantee to pay the mortgage available to the mortgagee of land conveyed to him it must be made to a person personally liable for the mortgage debt. Wise v. Fuller, 29 N. J. Eq. 333.

If the real intention of the parties to the agreement was that plaintiff should assume the payment of the bond and mortgage to the then holders thereof, so as to give them the right to claim the benefit of that promise, it was a mere contract of indemnity as between the parties. Halsey v. Reed, 9 Paige, 441.

Estoppel of grantee.

A purchaser of land who assumes to pay a prior mortgage on it as part of the purchase price is estopped to question the validity of the mortgage for any cause although it may be invalid as between the original parties. Millington v. Hill, 47 Ark. 301; Tuttle v. Arundstead, 3 New Eng. Rep. 321, 53 Conn. 175; Hancock v. Fleming, 1 West. Rep. 322, 108 Ind. 322.

So the purchaser of the equity of redemption assuming payment of notes secured by the trust deed cannot set up usury. Haley v. Sloan, 4 West. Rep. 163, 116 Ill. 321.

Where after the purchase of a mortgage the mortgaged premises are conveyed subject to the mortgage which the grantee by the deed assumes and covenants to pay, such grantee is not estopped from insisting, as against such purchaser, that he is not liable under the covenant. Real Estate Trust Co. v. Dalch, 12 Jones & S. 321.

But where a person accepts a conveyance of real estate subject to a mortgage, which he assumes as a part of the consideration money of the conveyance, he will not be allowed to protect himself against the performance of the obligation so assumed by denying the personal liability of his grantor for the payment of the said mortgage. Thayer v. Marsh, 11 Hun, 504; Van Schaick v. Third Ave. R. Co., 25 N. Y. 345; Campbell v. Smith, 3 Hun, 8; Garney v. Rogers, 47 N. Y. 322.

A grantee assuming payment of a mortgage is estopped to set up a title acquired under a prior mortgage. Connor v. Howe, 35 Minn. 515.

But he may purchase a title paramount without its inuring to the benefit of the mortgagee. Hancock v. Fleming, 1 West. Rep. 320, 108 Ind. 322.

Test of personal obligation of grantee.

To constitute a personal obligation upon a party taking a conveyance of land incumbered by a mortgage binding him to the absolute payment thereof, something more is requisite than a mere statement in the deed that the conveyance is made subject to such mortgage. Stebbins v. Hall, 29 Barb. 503.

a deed, who assumes and agrees to pay a mortgage on the property conveyed, undertakes thereby to terminate the vital existence of the mortgage or only to cancel the mortgage debt, so far as it is a claim against individuals, without discharging the mortgagee's lien upon the land.

One who assumes a mortgage in such an agreement takes upon himself the burden of the debt or claim secured by the mortgage, and there is no doubt that, as between him and his grantor, he becomes the principal, and the latter merely a surety, for the payment of the debt. It is said, in many cases, that primarily the mortgage is a charge upon the land, but it would be more accurate to say that it is made primarily a charge upon the purchase money reserved by the grantee to pay it. Thayer ad. Torrey, 37 N. J. L. 339.

The relation of the parties and the nature of the contract are the same as if the entire consideration had been paid to the grantor, and he had then taken a part of the money sufficient to pay the mortgage and had intrusted it to the grantee upon his promise to carry it to the mortgagee, and pay it over in satisfaction of the mortgage. Performance of the promise would cancel the mortgage and leave the estate discharged from the lien. If, as a part of the contract, another portion of the consideration had been paid by giving a second mortgage on the property, the discharge of the first mortgage by payment of the money as agreed might be a very important part of the arrangement, without which the second mortgage would be valueless. In assuming the mortgage, the grantee not only undertakes to relieve the mortgagor from personal liability for the debt, but from all liability under the mortgage. If the mortgagor were released from the debt while the mortgage was allowed to remain a binding contract, enforceable against the land, he would still be liable on the covenants and agreements contained in the mortgage. The implied contract would not be performed so long as the mortgage was outstanding as a valid instrument, upon which the mortgagor could in any form be liable. None of the cases which have come to our attention imply that the payment to be made by a grantee in such a case is anything less than an ordinary payment, which works a complete discharge of the mortgage. The reasoning upon which it is held that the damage to be recovered for a breach of such a contract is the amount of the mortgage debt, if no part of it has been paid, and the authorities cited in support of that doctrine, rest upon the ground that an absolute payment should be made. And, where there is an express agreement to pay, the word "pay" is used in its usual sense. Bremen v. Doose, 13 Cush. 237; Furness v. Dargis, 119 Mass. 500; Locke v. Homer, 131 Mass. 98, and cases cited.

It follows that, in an ordinary case of this kind, if a grantee who has assumed a mortgage should procure from the mortgagee a discharge of the mortgagor from personal liability upon the debt, and leave the mortgage still in force, he could be sued by his grantor for a breach of his contract, and nominal damage could be recovered if no actual damage

A recital in a deed, that the land is subject to a mortgage, the amount due thereon being part of and deducted from the consideration, without stating that the grantee assumes payment of the mortgage, does not render the grantee personally liable for a deficiency on foreclosure. Equitable L. Assur. Society v. Bostwick, 1 Cent. Rep. 333, 100 N. Y. 333.

The mere covenant with vendor to pay the mortgage debt does not shift the charge from the fund primarily liable. Wilbur v. Warren, 3 Cent. Rep. 313, 104 N. Y. 132.

The essential purpose of a covenant on the grantee's part to pay the mortgage is to indemnify the mortgagor against a contingency that the land may not bring enough to pay the mortgage, and thereby leaves him exposed to a claim for a deficiency. Wilbur v. Warren, 3 Cent. Rep. 313, 104 N. Y. 132.

If by the terms of the deed the plaintiff was to pay the mortgage, and the amount thereof was deducted from the consideration money, it seems, as between him and the mortgagor, in equity, the plaintiff is personally liable for any deficiency. Gilbert v. Averill, 15 Barb. 33; Tison v. Annin, 3 Johns. Ch. 133; Higelow v. Bush, 4 Paige, 343; Hoyer v. Pruyn, 7 Paige, 433; Jumel v. Jumel, 7 Paige, 301; Vanderkemp v. Bolton, 11 Paige, 33; Ferris v. Crawford, 3 Denio, 333; King v. Whitely, 10 Paige, 433.

Where an owner of property, at the time incumbered, assigns it to another, on his agreement to pay the incumbrance and sell the property, he may have judgment against the first and second purchasers upon their promise severally, for the amount agreed upon. But he can have no such judgment against the third purchaser, as he did not personally promise to pay, nor against the fourth purchaser, as his promise was under no personal liability to pay. Ford v. David, 1 Bosw. 301.

Relation of vendor and vendee as principal and surety.

It is the general principle that where the owner of land mortgages it to secure the payment of a debt, and afterwards sell the equity of redemption subject to the lien of the mortgage, and the purchaser assumes the payment of the mortgage as a portion of the purchase money, the latter becomes personally liable for the payment of the debt of the former to the holder of the mortgage in the first instance; and if the mortgagor is compelled to pay it, he can recover it from the purchaser of the equity of redemption. In such case the mortgagor and purchaser stand in the relation of principal and surety, the latter as security for the former, to the extent of the mortgage debt. Flagg v. Munger, 9 N. Y. 439; Sumell v. Pistor, 7 N. Y. 174; Flagg v. Thurber, 14 Barb. 301; Hartley v. Harrison, 34 N. Y. 171; Marsh v. Pike, 10 Paige, 335-337; Cornell v. Prescott, 3 Barb. 13; Ferris v. Crawford, 3 Denio, 333.

The equity of redemption is a legal estate, and a purchaser thereof can maintain a real action for the premises. Cowles v. Dickinson, 1 New Eng. Rep. 313, 140 Mass. 373.

Where a grantee expressly assumes, as part consideration, the payment of a mortgage debt, the fact that the title conveyed was invalid will not, while he remains in undisturbed possession and enjoyment of the premises, avail him as a defense to payment of the deficiency upon the foreclosure of the mortgage. Gifford v. Father Matthew T. A. Ben. Society, 3 Cent. Rep. 31, 104 N. Y. 133.

For a full discussion on this subject, on the sale of mortgaged premises and the remedies of the mortgagor, see note to Gifford v. Corrigan (N. Y.) 3 L. R. A. 323, and the exhaustive note to Brown v. Clark (Ill.) 3 L. R. A. 373.

was shown. If the grantor had such an interest in the property covered by the mortgage as to be actually damaged by the failure to remove the mortgage, he might recover his actual damages, notwithstanding that he had been relieved from personal liability upon the debt.

In the case at bar, the plaintiff suffered no actual damage by reason of his liability upon the debt, for that was paid by a sale of the mortgaged premises, but under the second mortgage he had security on the property for his liability named in that, and he was interested in having the first mortgage satisfied and discharged for the improvement of his security. As a direct result of the breach of the contract, he was deprived of that security. The damage which he has suffered is not too remote, but must be presumed to have been contemplated by the parties when they made their contract.

The only remaining objection to his recovery of this damage is that it is uncertain whether he will ever be required to pay the debt covered by the second mortgage. But there is much authority for holding that this fact can make no difference in favor of one who has failed to perform his contract. The defendant should have paid a sum of money which would have given the plaintiff perfect security for the payment by the defendant of the debt upon which the plaintiff is liable. The plaintiff's cause of action for this breach has already accrued. There can be but one recovery upon it, and all his damages must be assessed now. He was entitled to a security which would have been perfect for the amount of the debt. Through the defendant's fault he has no security. His damage is the value of the security which he should have had, up to and not exceeding the amount of the debt secured. Lathbridge v. Mytton, 2 Barn. & Ad. 472; Brown v. Howard, 2 Brod. & B. 72; Howell v. Young, 5 Barn. & C. 259; Loamers v. Radford, 9 Mea. & W. 657; Lathrop v. Atwood, 21 Conn. 117; Port v. Jackson, 17 Johns. 239; Re Noyes, 7 Wend. 499; Crofoot v. Moore, 4 Vt. 204; Wilson v. Stilwell, 9 Ohio St. 467; Stout v. Folger, 34 Iowa, 71; Ham v. Hill, 29 Mo. 273; Leche v. Homer, 131 Mass. 93.

The principle involved is the same as that in Purves v. Duggan, 119 Mass. 600, and other similar cases. In that case it was uncertain whether the plaintiff would ever be called upon to pay any part of the money which he recovered, for the note might be paid by a sale of the land under the mortgage. We are of opinion, therefore, that the plaintiff was rightfully allowed to recover damages for the loss of his security, caused by the defendant's neglect to perform his contract.

The defendant cannot maintain his declaration in set-off. The action was brought to recover unliquidated damages for a breach of contract, and the claim sought to be set off is of the same kind and is not within the Statute, Pub. Stat. chap. 169, §§ 3-7.

Judgment affirmed.

Field, J., dissenting:

It is conceded in the opinion of a majority of the court that the debt secured by the first mortgage had been fully paid, before the suit was brought, out of the proceeds of the land which had been sold under the power contained in this mortgage, and that neither the interest nor any part of the principal debt secured by the second mortgage had, when the suit was brought, become payable. The contention is that the promise of the defendant to the plaintiff to assume and pay these mortgages, which is to be implied from the acceptance of the deed, was a promise to pay off, immediately on receiving the deed, the first mortgage and to have it discharged, so that thereafter the second mortgage should be a first mortgage, and the plaintiff should have this additional security; that the defendant would pay the second mortgage when and as it became payable; that the defendant has not kept this promise but has neglected to pay off the first mortgage and to have it discharged; and that therefore the plaintiff is entitled to recover the whole amount of the debt secured by the second mortgage as damages.

This contention seems to me to be founded upon a misconception of the nature of the contract of the defendant. It was, I think, a personal contract by the defendant with the plaintiff that he would pay to the mortgagees respectively the mortgage debts when and as they became payable, so that the plaintiff, who had parted with all his interest in the land, should not be called upon to pay them, but should be discharged from all personal liability. The plaintiff might have taken security from the defendant for the performance of this contract, but he took none. The promise which is implied by the defendant's acceptance of the deed did not convey to the plaintiff any interest in the land. If the plaintiff paid the mortgages he would be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagees against the land in addition to his rights against the defendant on his promise, but this right of subrogation he would have had if the defendant had made no promise to assume and pay the mortgages, but had taken a deed subject to the mortgages. This contract of the defendant with the plaintiff, under our law, gave no additional rights to the mortgagees, they could not sue the defendant upon it in their own names, nor could they, without the plaintiff's consent, bring suit in his name. Prentiss v. Bromhall, 128 Mass. 201; Coffin v. Adams, 131 Mass. 133.

The contract of the defendant with the plaintiff contained, in effect, two promises, namely, to pay to two different persons two separate debts due to those persons at different times from the plaintiff. If these debts were paid, when they became payable, out of the proceeds of the land, or by the defendant out of any other property, the plaintiff would have no cause of action. As between the successive holders of the equity of redemption, the land was the primary fund for the payment of these debts, although the mortgagees might resort to any and all remedies which the law gave them. Although the first mortgage debt was payable on demand, and therefore an action accrued immediately to the plaintiff when the defendant refused to pay it, yet as the mortgage debt was fully satisfied before the suit was brought, the plaintiff had, when he brought his suit, no cause of action on account of the first mortgage. McAlis v. Fluke, 131 Mass. 110; Hood v. Adams, 134 Mass. 491.

As nothing was due and payable on the debt secured by the second mortgage when the suit was brought, the plaintiff had no cause of action on account of the second mortgage. If the plaintiff should pay the second mortgage debt when and as it becomes payable, he would perform his promise with respect to this mortgage, and it could not be known when the suit was brought that he would not do this. The defendant never made any promise that the second mortgage should become a first mortgage as security to the plaintiff that he would perform his promise to pay the second mortgage debt when it became due and payable, and never made any promise that the mortgages should not be paid out of the proceeds of the land. It is not contended that he made any such promise in terms, but it is contended that this would be the effect of a performance of the defendant's promise to pay off the first mortgage, and that this must have been contemplated by the parties as one of the results of performance, and that therefore a cause of action arose for not bringing about this result, or that a cause of action arose because the defendant has not paid off the first mortgage out of other property than the land, and that the damages are to be assessed for the whole amount of the second mortgage because this mortgage, since the sale of the land, attaches only to the surplus, if any, of the proceeds of the sale after paying the first mortgage debt and not as a first mortgage to the land itself. If the land had not been sold and the plaintiff had brought suit for the neglect of the defendant to pay the first mortgage on demand, the damages would have been the amount of the debt secured by this mortgage. The amount of the second mortgage could not be included in the damages because the obligation to pay that mortgage when it became due was a separate obligation. The parties certainly contemplated that the defendant might sell and convey the equity of redemption, subject to the mortgages, and it appears that he had conveyed it to Joseph Lively subject to these mortgages before the mortgage sale. He might have conveyed it to Lively with a promise himself to assume and pay the mortgages, or under a promise from Lively that he would assume and pay them, or simply subject to the mortgages, as the conveyance was in fact made. As Lively took the equity subject to the mortgages, and without any promise on the part of the defendant to pay them, if the defendant paid them he would be entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagees against the land and thus compel Lively either to pay him what he had paid or to lose the equity of redemption in the land. Hermann v. Fanning, 151 Mass. —.

Whether if the defendant had paid the first mortgage out of other property than the land it would have operated as an absolute discharge of the mortgage, would depend upon his relations to the owners of the equity of redemption subject to this mortgage. He was under no obligation to the second mortgagor to make his a first mortgage, and the only promise he had made to the plaintiff was to assume and pay the mortgages when they became payable. If he conveyed the equity of redemption as he might do, he had an interest in having the mortgages ultimately paid out of the land, so far as the proceeds of the land would pay them, and he never agreed with the plaintiff that he would part with the right to have this done.

Before the decisions in Furness v. Duryin, 119 Mass. 500, and Locke v. Homer, 121 Mass. 83, it was a question whether a grantor must not first pay the mortgage debt before he could sue his grantee upon such a promise as is contained in the deed in this case. It was decided in those cases that this need not be done, but that the grantor could recover the amount of the mortgage debt if it was payable, because, as between the parties, it was the duty of the grantee to pay it. But the grantee would have the right to have the money which he was compelled to pay to the grantor applied to the payment of the mortgage debt, and whether this payment would operate as a discharge of the mortgage would depend upon the relation of the grantee to other persons having interests in the land subject to the mortgage. If the grantor retained no interest in the land and his personal liability on the mortgage debt was discharged, he would have no interest in the question whether the grantee should be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagees as against the land. If in the present case the first mortgage had made an agreement under seal with the defendant to extend the time of payment, and had taken the obligation of the defendant to pay the debt, knowing that the defendant had promised the plaintiff to assume and pay it, this agreement would, perhaps, have discharged the plaintiff from any personal liability on the mortgage debt, but the making of such an agreement would not have constituted a breach of the defendant's promise to the plaintiff. See Dickerson v. Williams, 120 Mass. 108; Meldou, Hubr. & 20; Murray v. Marshall, 94 N. Y. 611.

On the contract of the defendant, implied from the acceptance of the deed, the plaintiff had the same rights of action which he would have upon a similar contract made upon a valuable consideration by a third person, and he would also, if he were compelled to pay the mortgage debts, be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagees against the land, in the same manner as if he had conveyed the equity of redemption subject to the mortgages, but without any promise on the part of the defendant to pay them. The damages for a breach of the promise to pay the debt secured by the first mortgage could never have been greater than the debt itself, and as this has been paid out of the property which the defendant had a right to have appropriated to its payment before the suit was brought, there were no damages for this breach, and there was when the suit was brought no breach of the promise to assume and pay the second mortgage. See Gaffney v. Hicks, 124 Mass. 301.

I think that there should be judgment for defendant.

Mr. Justice Devens and Mr. Justice William Allen concur in this dissenting opinion.

AMERICAN ORDER OF SCOTTISH CLANS

George B. MERRILL et al.

(.....Mass.....)

No suit will lie in favor of one corporation organized under the Act of 1888, chap. 429, to enjoin either the organization of another corporation with a name so similar to the first as to be within the apparent prohibition of § 2 of that Act, or the use of such name, since § 7 makes it the duty of the commissioner of insurance to determine whether the names conflict before the certificate which is made conclusive evidence of the existence of the corporation is issued; nor will the suit lie to protect the first name as a trade-name since it was taken subject to whatever interference might be permitted by the Statute.

(June 12, 1900.)

REPORT from the Supreme Judicial Court for Suffolk County (Devens, J.), for the consideration of the full court of a suit brought to enjoin the use by defendants of a certain corporate name. Bill dismissed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Messrs. Charles T. Gallagher and Hollis R. Bailey, for plaintiff:

Where a party claims a franchise under a statute, and is in the possession and enjoyment of such franchise, equity will interpose to protect and secure the enjoyment of such franchise, because it affords the only plain and adequate remedy.

Boston Water Power Co. v. Boston & W. R. Corp. 16 Pick. 535; Newburgh & C. Turnp. Road v. Miller, 5 Johns. Ch. 101, 1 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 1025; Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 6 Pick. 405, 406.

Where the persons complained against profess to act by public authority, and exceed their authority, it is held to be a peculiarly proper case for the interposition of a court of equity.

Boston Water Power Co. v. Boston & W. R. Corp. supra, and cases cited; Hart v. Jamaica Pond Aqueduct Corp. 188 Mass. 488; Winslow v. Noyes, 118 Mass. 421.

Under the general law relating to the use of trade-names, where a corporation is lawfully established under a particular name, other persons cannot commence and do business under a name so similar that it not only is liable to be mistaken therefor, but in repeated instances actually is mistaken therefor, so that the business of the original corporation is prejudiced and is liable to be still further prejudiced thereby.

Celvyloid Mfg. Co. v. Callenite Mfg. Co. 89 Fed. Rep. 94, 97.

Messrs. Edward Avery and William H. Hart, for defendants Ward et al.:

Under the provisions of sections 2 and 7 of the Act of 1888, chap. 429, the whole subject matter of this action was committed to the judgment and discretion of the insurance commissioner, and cannot be considered by this court, and made the basis of the relief sought by the plaintiff in this proceeding.

Boston Rubber Shoe Co. v. Boston Rubber Co. 149 Mass. 486.

It is not the province of courts in equity on bill filed to compel independent tribunals to exercise their judgment in a given way, nor, even by the writ of mandamus, compel such tribunals to exercise their judgment or discretion.

Boston v. Shaw, 1 Met. 180; Leland v. Woodbury, 4 Cush. 245; Comrs. of the Poor v. Gains, 8 Brev. 806; Fitch v. Kirkland, 23 Wend. 153; Ezekiel v. Dixon, 3 Ga. 145; *Stevens v. S. 7 Wall. 852, 859 (19 L. ed. 64, 65); Western R. Co. v. DeGraff, 27 Minn. 5.

It was the judgment of the insurance commissioner that the Legislature invoked, and not that of any other person, body or tribunal.

Grogg v. Massachusetts Medical Society, 111 Mass. 185.

When an organization is effected under the Acts of 1888, and has adopted a name, the name thus adopted and approved by the insurance commissioner can only be changed by the general court.

Act 1888, chap. 429, § 2; Boston Rubber Shoe Co. v. Boston Rubber Co. 149 Mass. 486.

The certificate issued by the Secretary of State is conclusive as to private persons of the right to corporate existence by a designated corporate name.

Boston Rubber Shoe Co. v. Boston Rubber Co. supra; Rice v. Com. Nat. Bank, 190 Mass. 300. See also Pub. Stat. chap. 186, § 17.

Holmes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This bill was brought by a fraternal beneficiary corporation formed under Stat. 1888, chap. 429, to enjoin certain of the defendants from organizing another corporation under the same Act by the name of "The Order of Scottish Clans," and also to enjoin the insurance commissioner and the secretary of the Commonwealth from issuing to them the certificate and charter provided for in the Act. After the subpoena was served, the organization of the corporation was completed and a charter was issued, whereupon the plaintiff made an amendment to its bill in the nature of a supplemental bill alleging these facts. It is found as a fact that the name "Order of Scottish Clans," is "so similar to the plaintiff's name as to be liable to be mistaken therefor," and it follows that it is within the express prohibition of section 2, if we are at liberty to consider that fact,—that is to say, if we can go behind the effect of the certificate of the insurance commissioner and of the charter consistently with the terms of section 7.

Of course the right of the defendants to use the name might be left subject to revision upon private suit notwithstanding the issue of the charter, after the analogy of patents. The question is one of construction and the language of the Statute is not entirely conclusive. But practically the construction is settled by Boston Rubber Shoe Co. v. Boston Rubber Co.

3 L. R. A.

140 Mass. 433. That case arose under Stat. 1870, chap. 204, but the provisions of that Act are followed substantially in the one before us, except that the prohibition against adopting a name previously in use, or so similar as to be liable to be mistaken for it, in section 9 of the latter, is somewhat fuller and more direct than that in section 8 of the earlier, Act. Pub. Stat. chap. 100, § 17.

The condition attached to the granting of a certificate by the insurance commissioner in section 7 of the present Act is, "if it appears (i. e., to the commissioner) that the purposes and proceedings of the corporation conform to law," instead of "that the requirements of the preceding sections of this Act have been complied with," in section 11 of the Acts of 1870 (Pub. Stat. chap. 100, § 21). The certificate of the secretary of the Commonwealth under the present Act "shall be conclusive evidence of the existence of such corporation at the date of such certificate." § 7.

This does not seem to vary materially, so far as the present question is concerned, from "shall have the force and effect of a special charter, and be conclusive evidence of the organization and establishment of such corporation," in Stat. 1870, § 11 (Pub. Stat. chap. 100, § 21).

In the case which we have cited it was said: "The Legislature plainly intended . . . that in a case within the provision of the Statute the certificate should be conclusive as to private persons of the rights to the corporate existence by the designated corporate name." And in the following: "The question whether the franchise was improperly obtained or improvidently granted may arise in proceedings for a forfeiture in behalf of the public, but is not open in proceedings by a private person under Pub. Stat., chap. 130, § 17." 140 Mass. 440. See also p. 439.

By the same principles, this bill could not be maintained if it were brought now. How far one name not absolutely the same as another resembles it is a matter of degree, and whether one is so like the other as to be liable to be mistaken for it is a matter of judgment, not admitting of exact measurement. If the judgment of the commissioner is ever conclusive, we cannot go behind it simply because we think it very plain that he made a mistake.

The plaintiff got no better standing by seeking to anticipate the action of the statutory tribunal. The case is not like those where a court of equity enjoins parties from proceeding with an action at law. That is done to enforce some equitable principle which a court of law would not recognize. But the commissioner is bound to proceed upon the same principles that this court would proceed upon. It is part of his duty to pass on the question whether the name applied for has the prohibited resemblance to that of an existing company. We must assume that he will do his duty and is competent to form a judgment on the question. We cannot prohibit him from doing what the Statute expressly commits to his determination; neither can we prohibit private parties from applying to him to do it in the manner expressly authorized by statute. See Grogg v. Massachusetts Medical Society, 111 Mass. 186.

The plaintiff attempts to maintain its bill, not merely under the Statute, but also on the ground that it is entitled to have its name protected as a trade-name. We think it plain that if its name can be called a trade-name in any sense the plaintiff gets no additional rights on that account. It received its name in the first instance as a corporate name under the Statute, subject as such to whatever interference by subsequent corporations might be permitted under the Statute. The name remained subject to the same degree of interference whatever importance it might acquire in a business way. The principle is somewhat like that upon which patentees have been denied the exclusive right to the names of their patented articles as trade-marks after their patents have expired. The degree of protection to which the plaintiff is entitled is measured by the rights which the Statute confers upon it. The limit is marked by the adjudication of the insurance commissioner. See Linoleum Mfg. Co. v. Nairn, L. R. 7 Ch. Div. 534, Re J. B. Palmer's Trade Mark, L. R. 24, Ch. Div. 504, 517, 531; Re Ralph's Trade-Mark, L. R. 25 Ch. Div. 194, 199, Quate v. Marriah Thread Co. 36 Fed. Rep. 334.

When there are no statute provisions as to the choice of names, and parties organize a corporation under general laws, it may be that they choose the name at their peril, and that if they take one so like that of an existing corporation as to be misleading and thereby to injure its business, they may be enjoined if there is no language in the Statute to the contrary. Holmes v. Holmes, B. & A. Mfg. Co. 87 Conn. 279, Newby v. Oregon Cent. R. Co. Dundy, 600; Celluloid Mfg. Co. v. Cellonite Mfg. Co. 20 Fed. Rep. 94, 97.

But these decisions do not apply to a case where the plaintiff and defendant both got their names under a statute requiring such an adjudication as was required by the Act of 1868.

Bill dismissed.

answer the facts which show an assumption of the principal defendant under a statute providing that "no current wages for personal services shall be subject to garnishment" will deprive him of the protection of a judgment against him as against the principal defendant, if the latter has not appeared or been formally cited to appear in the garnishment proceedings, although he made default in the principal suit.

(April 18, 1893)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Bexar County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover wages alleged to be due. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Maura Carr & Lewis, for plaintiff in error:

The judgment against defendant in the garnishment proceedings afforded it a complete protection against liability in this suit.

Lalonde v. San Mutual Ins. Co. 9 Tex. App. 40.

Mr. T. G. Pray for defendant in error.

Gaines, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought by the defendant in error against plaintiff in error to recover a balance due him for services as a brakeman. The defendant Company answered, among other things, that, in a certain suit in which this plaintiff was defendant, a writ of garnishment had been served upon it, and that upon the coming in of its answer a judgment had been rendered against it, which it had paid. A transcript of the proceedings in the garnishment suit was introduced in evidence by the defendant upon the trial. They showed that the defendant Company answered that it was indebted to this plaintiff, but did not show that the answer disclosed that the indebtedness was for current wages. The court held that the judgment in the garnishment proceedings, and its payment by the defendant Company, did not diminish the liability of the Company to the plaintiff in this suit, and gave judgment accordingly. The ruling of the court in that particular is here assigned as error.

Our Statutes provide that "no current wages for personal service shall be subject to garnishment, and, where it appears upon the trial that the garnishee is indebted to the defendant for such current wages, the garnishee shall nevertheless be discharged as to such indebtedness." Rev. Stat. art. 218.

The question, then, is, Will the garnishee, who is indebted to the defendant in the suit for current wages, be protected by a judgment against him when he fails to state in his answer the facts which show the exemption? We think this question must be answered in the negative. The garnishment proceeding is ancillary to the main suit, and to it the defendant in the principal action is not a party. He is not required to be served with notice of either the issuing or the service of the writ of garnishment. It is true that our Statutes, literally construed, require the garnishee to answer only whether or not he is indebted to defendant, and whether or not he has any effects of the defendant in his possession, and does not, in terms, direct that he shall say whether such indebtedness or such effects are exempt from a forced appropriation to the payment of debts or not. Id. arts. 188, 189.

The statutes of some of the States require him to answer only as to debts or property not exempt. We think, however, that, since the defendant is not required by the Statute to have notice of the service of the writ, it was not intended that the garnishee should in his answer confine himself to the literal directions of the Statute, when he knows that the debt or property is exempt. Such a rule would place it in the power of the garnishee, in many cases, to deprive the defendant of the exemption which the law affords him. The garnishment may issue after judgment; and, even when it is issued before, the defendant may remain ignorant of the fact, unless he sees proper to defend the principal suit. If, after service of citation, he determines not to defend, he may expect a judgment to be rendered against him, and execution to issue; but we know of no rule which requires him to take notice of any ancillary proceedings. If he fails to appear, and the plaintiff amends the statement of his demand so as to show a cause of action materially different, he must have notice. For this reason, we cannot think that it was the intention of the Legislature that he should be concluded by the judgment in the garnishment proceeding when the garnishee has failed to disclose the facts showing the exemption, and when he has not been formally cited to appear, and has not voluntarily appeared for the purpose of maintaining his right. This ruling we think in accordance with the great weight of authority in the courts of other States. The Statute of Maine provides that "no person shall be adjudged a trustee . . . by reason of any amount due from him to the principal defendant, as wages for his personal labor, for a time not exceeding one month." Rev. Stat. 1841, chap. 119, § 82.

In construing that Statute the Supreme Court of that State says: "The Statute secures to the laborer his claim of payment for one month's labor, and places it beyond the reach of his creditors; and his debtor cannot deprive him of it by his neglect to disclose the whole matter when summoned as his trustee." Lock v. Johnson, 36 Me. 464. The following authorities are to the same effect: Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Hagland, 84 Ill. 375, Winterfeld v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 20 Wis. 589, Daniels v. Marr, 75 Me. 297; Jones v. Tracy, 75 Pa. 417.

The case before us illustrates the injustice of a contrary doctrine. The suit in which the writ of garnishment was sued out was brought June 25, 1888, in a justice's court of Williamson County. The writ of garnishment was issued, was served and was answered by the garnishee on the same day the suit was instituted. The citation for the defendant to Williamson County was returned "Not found," when an alias issued to Bexar County, and was served upon him. He made default. There is nothing in the record to indicate that he ever had any reason to suspect that a garnishment had issued to subject his wages to the payment of the debt. In saying that the defendant in the principal suit is not a party to the garnishment proceeding, we do not wish to be understood as holding that he has not the right to appear in a case like this, and to make his own defense. On the contrary, our statutes expressly permit this. Rev. Stat. art. 212.

What we do mean to say is that he is not to be held to have constructive notice of the garnishment proceeding.

We will say, in addition, that, in every case of this character, it would be a proper practice for the garnishee, after disclosing the facts which show the exemption, to have the defendant cited, to the end that he should make his own defense. See Iglehart v. Moors, 31 Tex. 501.

The parties at interest will then have the burden of the litigation; and upon the trial the garnishee will be entitled to recover his costs, and a reasonable attorney's fee, for his answer. This certainly should be the practice when the fact of the exemption is contested by the plaintiff, or when the garnishee is in doubt as to the facts. Such a rule affords ample protection to all parties.

The judgment is affirmed.

v.
WILL LEVL
(35 Tex. 337.)

Delay in the transportation of goods, which is caused solely by a mob, will not render the carrier liable at common law to make good losses arising from a decline in their market price or from a deterioration in their quality on account of their perishable nature, during time of transit.

(February 14, 1898.)*

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Tarrant County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for losses alleged to have resulted from defendant's delay in the transportation of certain goods. Reversed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Mr. J. W. Terry, with Messrs. Shepard & Miller, for appellant:

A common carrier is not and never has been held liable for deterioration in quality or value of the goods, caused by delay, in connection with the inherent infirmity of the property transported, which, so far as the carrier was concerned, was unavoidable, and not contributed to by any negligence of the carrier.

* An opinion was handed down in this case on December 17, 1898, in conformity with a decision affirming the judgment of the lower court. A rehearing was subsequently granted, the judgment reversed and the opinion given herewith handed down. The former opinion is therefore superseded and is consequently omitted. [Rep.]

NOTE.—Carrier of freight; liability for failure to transport; mobs no excuse.

On failure to transport to the destination agreed, the carrier is liable for the excess over the price stipulated and paid to other carriers to complete the transportation, with interest. White v. Missouri P. R. Co. 3 West. Rep. 128, 19 Mo. App. 400.

A contract to a terminal point, with privilege to a point beyond, is binding. Ibid.

The fact that a riotous mob existed, preventing the employes from operating the line to the point of election, is no excuse. Ibid.

Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Bennett, 89 Ind. 457, 6 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 391.

The common-law liability of carriers was placed upon them that they might be safe in their ways of dealing; for else these carriers might have an opportunity of undoing all persons that had any dealings with them, by combining with thieves, etc., and yet doing it in such a clandestine manner as would not be possible to be discovered.

Cassellier v. Abraham and Phillips v. Sanford, supra; Haynis v. Baylor, 10 Tex. 498; Arnold v. Jones, supra.

Stanton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

A further consideration of this case induces us to believe that the former disposition made of it was erroneous, and the motion for rehearing is sustained. Appellee brought this action to recover damages resulting from delay in transporting a carload of lemons, received by appellant from another railway company at Rosenberg Junction, to be transported to Fort Worth. He alleged, if the lemons had been transported within a reasonable time, they would have reached Fort Worth on September 27, at which time they were then worth in the market $12 per box, but that they were not delivered at Fort Worth until October 2, when they were worth in the market only $4 per box, and that by reason of this delay he was damaged $2,000, there being $250 boxes. He further alleged that the lemons were shipped from New Orleans in a ventilated car, as was necessary for their preservation, but that while en route they were transferred from that to a close car, whereby they were caused to heat and rot, and that from this cause fifty boxes were lost, for which he asked $500 as damages. He further alleged that he was compelled to sort the lemons after they were received at Fort Worth, which cost him fifty cents per box, and this he also sought to recover. The petition then proceeds as follows: "Wherefore plaintiff avers and charges that, by reason of said unreasonable delay in the transportation and delivery of said lemons as aforesaid, and the depreciation of the price thereof as aforesaid, and the transferring said lemons from said ventilated car to said close car as aforesaid, he has been damaged in the sum of $2,750," for which he prays judgment. Defendant answered by a general denial, and further specially pleaded as follows: "And for further and special answer the defendant says that, if it ever received the fruit described in plaintiff's petition, the same was received by it at Rosenberg Junction from the G. H. & S. A. Ry. Company, and was immediately forwarded from said station in said car in which the same had been delivered to defendant, without opening the same. That the said carload of fruit was carried with speed and safety to the City of Temple, in Bell County, through which it had to pass to be delivered to plaintiff at Fort Worth. That said car, on its arrival at Temple, was taken from the train, and side-tracked by a mob of persons, who, at the time, were engaged in a riot in the said City of Temple, and in the removal and destruction of defendant's property, including its road-bed, rolling stock, freight, etc., at said place. That said rioters were in great force and number, and that it was impossible for defendant, with its agents and employes, to resist them, or dispossess them of defendant's property. That when the plaintiff's fruit arrived at Temple in the said car the said rioters immediately stopped the train and car bearing the said fruit, and took possession thereof and out of the control of defendant with overpowering force and arms, and against its protest, and notwithstanding ing its strenuous and exhausting efforts to prevent the same. The said rioters uncoupled the cars, and forced said car of fruit upon a side track, where, by overwhelming force and arms and violence, for the space of, to wit, five days, they held possession of the same, refusing to permit the defendant to remove the same; and using force and violence to prevent defendant, and its agents and employes, from moving said car, as it then offered and wished and was ready to do. Defendant says that it had remaining in its employ at and during said time a sufficient number of competent employes, who would have moved its trains and carried said car of fruit and other freight, had it not been prevented by the force and violence herein charged. Defendant made every possible effort to resume control of its property, and to move its said trains, and ship the car bearing plaintiff's fruit, and through its manager and agents appealed to city, county and state authorities and officers for assistance and force to control said riot, and the prevailing unlawful force, and to assist defendant to repossess itself of its property, and to pursue its lawful business. But defendant says that neither the city, county nor state officers and authorities were able to furnish sufficient force to subdue said riot, and dispossess said rioters, and drive them from the occupation of defendant's property. That this state of affairs existed for the space of, to wit, five days, during which the plaintiff's fruit was in the control and in the possession of said rioters, and could not be handled or transported by defendant. That immediately after the cessation of said riot, and the dispersion of said rioters, which occurred at the end of, to wit, five days, the defendant immediately recovered its property and freight, and took possession of said car, and, as soon as it was possible transported the same to its destination, namely, the City of Fort Worth, in Tarrant County, where it delivered the same at once to plaintiff. Wherefore defendant says that it has not been guilty of any negligence in and about said transportation of said car, and said delay was not due to the neglect of its duties by defendant, but solely and wholly and entirely to the act of the said rioters and unlawful persons, and to the inability of the peace officers of the City of Temple and County of Bell and State of Texas to disperse the said rioters, and restrain them from acts of violence, and permit the defendant to pursue its ordinary and peaceful avocation. And all this the defendant is ready to verify, and prays judgment."

The plaintiff filed a general demurrer to this plea as setting up no lawful defense, which was sustained by the court. There was a judgment for the plaintiff, from which this appeal is prosecuted.

From the statement it will be seen that plaintiff based his claim for damages mainly on the ground that there was an unreasonable delay in the transportation of the lemons. If a defense to a claim for damages resulting from such a cause, other than inevitable accident or the act of God, can prevail, there can be no doubt that the answer sets up such a defense; and, if a good defense to any part of plaintiff's claim was set up in the answer, it was error to sustain a demurrer to it. Under the Statutes of this State the liability of the common carrier is that imposed by the rules of the common law. [Rev. Stat. art. 277.] "He is liable not only for losses occasioned by secret theft or embezzlement, but for those inflicted by highway robbery, by the spoliations and outrages of mobs, rioters and insurgents. The most resistless and destructive conflagration, if occasioned by human agency, without any negligence whatever on the part of the carrier, will furnish no valid ground of exemption." Chevalier v. Straham, 3 Tex. 123.

For failure to carry and deliver, the carrier cannot excuse himself by reason of the fact that, through human agency, not under his control, this was prevented without fault on his part; but if the property be wholly lost or partially decayed through some inherent quality, without fault on the part of the carrier, this will excuse the failure safely to carry and deliver, for the operation of the laws of nature, working destruction or loss, furnish the same excuse as do tempest, lightning or other cause termed the "act of God." The reasons on which the common-law rule is based are thus stated by the English judges, whose knowledge of the ground-work of that system has never been questioned:

In Forward v. Pittard, 1 T. R. 37, the reasons are thus stated by Lord Mansfield: "But to prevent litigation, collusion and the necessity of going into circumstances impossible to be unraveled, the law presumes against the carrier, unless he shows that it was done by the king's enemies, or by such act as could not happen by the intervention of man, as storms, lightning and tempests. If an armed force came to rob the carrier of the goods, he is liable; and a reason is given in the books, which is a bad one, viz., that he ought to have a sufficient force to repel it; but that would be impossible in some cases, as, for instance, in the riots of the year 1780. The true reason is, for fear it may give room for collusion, that the master may contrive to be robbed on purpose, and share the spoil."

The reasons are thus stated by Bert, C. J., in Riley v. Horne, 5 Bing. 220: "When goods are delivered to a carrier, they are usually no longer under the eye of the owner, he seldom follows or sends any servant with them to their place of destination. If they should be lost or injured by the grossest negligence of the carrier or his servants, or stolen by them, or by thieves in collusion with them, the owner would be unable to prove either of these causes of loss. His witnesses must be the carrier's servants, and they, knowing that they could not be contradicted, would excuse their masters and themselves. To give due security to property, the law has added to that responsibility of a carrier, which immediately rises out of his contract to carry for a reward, namely, that of taking all reasonable care of it, the responsibility of an insurer. From his liability as an insurer, the carrier is only to be relieved by two things, both so well known to all the country when they happen that no person would be so rash as to attempt to prove that they had happened when they had not, namely, the act of God and the king's enemies."

The same reasons do not apply when the thing is actually transported and delivered, although when delivered it may be greatly diminished in value by a fall in the market price, or its value partially or entirely destroyed by reason of its inherent perishable nature, which has worked its partial or entire destruction while in transit. The rule is thus stated by a recent text-writer, in accordance with the view expressed by many others: "But the reasons upon which the extraordinary responsibility of the common carrier for the safety of the goods is founded do not require that the same responsibility should be extended to the time occupied in their transportation. The danger of loss by robbery or embezzlement, or theft by collusion and fraud on his part, has no application when the mere time of the carriage is concerned. 'His first duty,' it is said, 'is to carry the goods safely, and the second to deliver them; and it would be very hard to oblige a carrier, in case of any obstruction, to risk the safety of the goods in order to prevent delay. His duty is to deliver the goods within a reasonable time, which is a term implied by the law in the contract to deliver; as Tindal, C. J., puts it, when he says: 'The duty to deliver within a reasonable time being merely a term ingrafted by legal implication upon the promise or duty to deliver generally.'" In this respect, therefore, the common carrier stands upon the same ground with other bailments, and may excuse delay in delivery of the goods by accident or misfortune, although not inevitable or produced by the act of God. All that can be required of him in such an emergency is that he shall exercise due care and diligence to guard against the delay, and that, if it occur without his fault or negligence, he shall omit no reasonable efforts to secure the safety of the goods." Hutch. Carr. § 800. See also sections 203, 251, 255.

Many cases are cited in the notes illustrative of the application of this rule, and we will briefly refer to some more recent.

In Haas v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & G. R. Co., 81 Ga. 792, 35 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 572, it was held that the company was not liable for loss resulting from "delay in delivering freight, caused by a strike of its employes, accompanied by intimidation and violence which could not be prevented or suppressed by either the company or the civil authorities."

The loss in that case resulted from a fall in the market price between the time the freight would ordinarily have been delivered, but for the obstruction, and the time when it was delivered.

In the case of Galsmer v. Lake Shore & M. & R. Co., 100 N. Y. 500, 3 Cent. Rep. 320, the same ruling was made, and the case distinguished from Wood v. Panama R. Co., 17 N. Y. 362, and Blackstock v. New York & E. R. Co., 20 N. Y. 43. Case last cited, while affirming the rule quoted from Hutchinson on Carriers, held that the simple fact that employes refused to work did not relieve the carrier from liability for failure to transport freight within the usual time.

Pittsburg, O. & St. L. R. Co. v. Hollowell, 66 Ind. 189, was a case in which a carrier was sought to be held liable for failure to receive and transport freight within the usual time, and the company set up a defense similar to that urged in the case before us. After stating the rule as to the liability of carriers for failure to deliver at place of destination, the court said: "But the strict rule contended for by the appellee is applicable to common carriers only after they have received the goods for transportation, and fail to deliver them at their destination, or when they are lost. In cases like the present, for delay in receiving and carrying the goods, the carrier is not an insurer, and is bound only by the general rule of liability for a breach of his contract, or of his public duty as a carrier; and may be excused for delay in receiving the goods, or in transporting them after they have been received, whenever the delay is necessarily caused by unforeseen disaster which human prudence cannot provide against, or by accident not caused by the negligence of the carrier, or by thieves and robbers, or an uncontrollable mob."

In Pittsburg, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. v. Haven, 84 Ill. 36, it was held competent for the carrier to show, in a suit for damages resulting from delay in the transit of freight, that the delay was caused solely by irresistible violence of men who are not in the employment of the company; and that when employes suddenly refused to work and were discharged, and others employed who were prevented by lawless violence of those discharged from doing duty, the company was not liable for delay thus caused.

The case of Lake Shore & N. B. R. Co. v. Bennett, 89 Ind. 437, 6 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 402, decided by the Supreme Court of Indiana, affirms the rule asserted in Pittsburg, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Hollowell, though the case was one under contract. Many cases might be cited in which carriers have been held not liable for injury resulting solely from delay, when this was shown to have been caused by misfortune or accident, not such as would relieve the carrier for loss of freight or failure to deliver it. We are of opinion that the answer excluded presented a good defense to so much of the action as sought to recover damages for decline in market price of lemons during time of transit.

It may be true that the answer does not present a defense arising from the fact that the lemons may have become less valuable while in transit by reason of material decay without fault on part of carrier; for there is no averment in the pleadings of either party that there was any diminution in value on that account. Plaintiff does allege that they heated, and on that account rotted to a given extent, but that was attributed to the wrongful act of defendant in putting them in an improper car. To the extent the fruit may have deteriorated, on account of its perishable nature, while in transit, the facts pleaded would furnish a defense, if defendant bestowed upon it proper care; for in such case such a loss would be attributed solely to the delay which the answer excuses. For the error of the court in sustaining the demurrer the judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded.

(....Tax. App....)

A bill published as a law after it has been deposited in the office of the Secretary of State, signed by the President of the Senate, Speaker of the House of Representatives and the Governor, cannot be shown by journals of the Legislature, or any other evidence, to be different from the Statute actually enacted, or invalid for failure to comply with any formalities required by the Constitution.

APPPLICATION for a writ of habeas corpus to inquire into the cause and validity of the detention of applicant in the custody of the sheriff of Smith County. Applicant remanded.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Meers, Finlay, Marsh & Butler and McLemore & Campbell for applicant. Mr. Davidson, Asst. Atty-Gen., for the State.

Willson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Applicant, T. W. Tipton, being in custody of the sheriff of Smith County by virtue of a capias issued from the county court of said county upon an information based upon a complaint charging said applicant with unlawfully selling refined kerosene illuminating fluid without first having the same inspected and branded according to law, applied to the county judge of said Smith County for the writ of habeas corpus, and said judge declined to grant said writ, but, as the question involved in the case was the validity of a statute, referred the application to this court, requesting action thereon. At Tyler this court granted the writ, and upon a hearing thereof took the cause under advisement, and transferred the same to this branch; and, after a thorough investigation of the question presented, we now declare our conclusions. It is claimed by applicant that the Statute

NOTE.—Legislature; passage of bills.

A bill becomes a law when it has gone through all the forms prescribed in the Constitution. Jones v. Hutchinson, 43 Ala. 721.

It becomes a law when it is passed by the Legislature and is approved by the governor. Memphis v. United States, 97 U. S. 388 (24 L. ed. 910).

After its transmission to the governor neither House can recall it. People v. Devlin, 38 N. Y. 388.

Legislative journals are not evidence of the meaning of a statute; this must be ascertained by the Act itself, and from facts connected with the subject on which it is to operate. Southwark Bank v. Com. 38 Pa. 446. See, however, Edger v. Randolph County, 70 Ind. 331.

They are themselves the highest evidence of the enactment of the law and of the time of its enactment. Gardner v. Barney, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 460 (18 L. ed. 880); People v. Starne, 33 Ill. 121; Blake v. National City Bank, 90 U. S. 38 Wall. 307 (23 L. ed. 119).

The Court may consult the journals of the two Houses of the Legislature to ascertain its will and intention where the statute to be interpreted is ambiguous. Edger v. Randolph County, supra. See note to People v. McElroy (Mich.) 2 L. R. A. 688.

for a violation of which he is being prosecuted and is in custody as aforesaid, to wit, the Act approved April 5, 1886, entitled "An Act to Provide for the Inspection of Refined Oils Which Are the Product of Petroleum, and Which May be Used for Illuminating Purposes within this State, and to Regulate the Sale and Use thereof, and to Provide Penalties for Violation of the Same," is not a valid law, because it is not the Statute which was in fact enacted by the Legislature. It is claimed by applicant, and is conceded by the assistant attorney-general, and is shown by the journals of the Senate and House of Representatives, that said Act originated in the House of Representatives, and was designated and known as "House Bill No. 167." It passed the House, and was sent to the Senate. In the Senate, section 3 of the bill was amended, and the bill was returned to the House with the senate amendment thereto. The House concurred in the senate amendment. The bill, as amended, was enrolled. The committee on enrolled bills reported to the House that the bill had been correctly enrolled, and the bill was then signed and presented to the governor, who approved it, and it was deposited in the secretary of state's office. As appears from the senate journals, the amendment to section 3 of said bill, which was adopted by the Senate, was as follows: "Provided, it shall not be necessary to inspect oil which has been inspected under a law of another State, and its quality determined and evidenced by the authentic stamp or mark of the inspector of such State."

In the enrolled bill, which is now the Statute we are considering, the proviso in section 3, corresponding to the amendment above quoted, reads "Provided, it shall not be necessary to inspect one which has been inspected under a law of another State." It is manifest that the proviso in the Statute and the proviso which is recited in the senate journals are not the same, but are essentially different.

But how far will the courts of this State go in inquiring into the acts of the legislative department of the government? When a bill has been authenticated by the signatures of the president of the Senate, and the speaker of the House of Representatives, and the governor of the State, and has been deposited in the office of the secretary of state, and published as a law of the State, will the courts of this State, from the journals of the Legislature or other evidence, determine that the statute is not a valid law because not enacted in accordance with the formalities required by the Constitution, or because the statute so authenticated is not the one enacted by the Legislature? In several of the American States, it is the established doctrine that the courts will inquire behind the authenticated statute into the manner of its enactment, and will from the journals determine whether or not it is a valid law. Counsel for applicant have referred us to numerous decisions which so hold, and which unquestionably support the propositions contended for in behalf of applicant. But there is much conflict of authority upon the questions above propounded. We shall not take the time to cite and review the vast number of decisions bearing upon the subject, believing, as we do, that the courts of this State have announced the rules by which we should be governed.

In Blossing v. Galveston, 43 Tex. 641, it is held that the judicial department, on the bare fact that the journals of one or both Houses of the Legislature fail to show the passage of the bill in full and strict conformity to all the directions contained in the Constitution, should not disregard and treat as naught an Act in all other respects unobjectionable. It is further clearly intimated, we think, in that decision that the authenticated statute should be regarded as the best, if not conclusive, evidence that the required formalities were observed in its passage, and that for the courts to exercise the power of going behind such Statute, and inquiring into the manner of its enactment, would lead to most disastrous consequences.

In Central R. Co. v. Horne, 33 Tex. 547, it is held that the best evidence of the terms of an Act of the Legislature is a duly certified copy of the enrolled bill.

In Day, L. & O. Co. v. State, 68 Tex. 526, it is held that it will be conclusively presumed that a bill had been referred to a committee and reported on before its passage, as required by the Constitution.

In Uerner v. State, 8 Tex. App. 177, this court quotes approvingly from State v. Swift, 10 Nev. 178, as follows: "Where an Act has been passed by the Legislature, signed by the proper officers of each House, approved by the governor, and filed in the office of the secretary of state, it constitutes a record which is conclusive evidence of the passage of the Act as enrolled. Neither the journals kept by the Legislature, nor the bill as originally introduced, nor the amendments attached to it, nor parol evidence can be received in order to show that an Act of the Legislature, properly enrolled, authenticated and deposited with the secretary of state, did not become a law. This court, for the purpose of informing itself of the existence or terms of a law, cannot look beyond the enrolled Act, certified to by those officers who are charged by the Constitution with the duty of certifying, and with the duty of deciding what laws have been enacted."

In Huat v. State, 23 Tex. App. 306, this court held that where the Constitution expressly requires that the journals shall show a particular fact or action of the Legislature in the enactment of a statute, as that the bill was signed by the presiding officer of each House, such fact or action must affirmatively appear in the journals, or the Statute will be invalid. But, where there is no express constitutional requirement that the journals shall show affirmatively that a constitutional requirement has been observed, it will be conclusively presumed that such requirement was observed; and neither the journals, nor any other evidence, will in such case be allowed to impeach the validity of the statute.

We conclude, therefore, that we are not at liberty to go behind the authenticated Statute in this instance. Upon its face, it is a valid law, and it is not claimed that the journals fail to show any fact expressly required to be shown in order to make it valid. It must be conclusively presumed that the Statute, as authenticated and deposited in the secretary of state's office, is precisely the same as was enacted by the Legislature. But, were we at liberty to go behind the Statute, and consult the journals, we would be confronted with conflicting evidence as to the amendment. The senate journals show that an amendment to section 8 was adopted in that House, and show what that amendment was, and that the bill and amendment were returned to the House of Representatives. The journals of the House of Representatives show that the amendment adopted by the Senate was concurred in, but does not set forth the amendment. The journals of the House further show that the bill as amended by the Senate was correctly enrolled, and this enrolled bill is the Statute authenticated and published as a law, but it does not contain the amendment as set forth in the senate journals. Which of the journals, those of the Senate or of the House, are correct? They are of equal credit. It may be that the amendment was incorrectly copied into the senate journals, and that the amendment in fact adopted by the Senate and concurred in by the House is that which appears in the enrolled bill. If, then, we were to look to the journals to determine the question, we should hold that the weight of evidence supports the validity of the Statute, because, the journals of the two Houses being of equal credit and weight, the authentication of the bill as enrolled by the presiding officers of the two Houses and by the executive corroborates and confirms the correctness of the house journals as to the amendment in fact adopted. It is ordered that the applicant be remanded to the custody of the sheriff of Smith County, and that he pay the costs of this proceeding.

Ordered accordingly.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

W. H. EMMONS, Appl.

CITY OF LEWISTOWN.

(.....III.....)

Canvassers for books are not hawkers or peddlers within the meaning of the Statute which gives municipal corporations power to compel hawkers and peddlers to obtain a license.

(March 21, 1890.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Fulton County convicting him of violating a city ordinance prohibiting the canvassing for books without first procuring a license. Reversed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Mr. H. W. Masters for appellant.

Messrs. Gray & Waggoner for appellee.

Shope, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, a resident of Logan County, in this State, was engaged, in the City of Lewistown, in canvassing and taking orders for the sale of religious books and Bibles published by the Historical Publishing Company of St. Louis, Mo., the books so ordered to be paid for when delivered; and while so engaged, as agent of such company, appellant was arrested and brought before a magistrate, and tried upon the charge of violating ordinance No. 45 of said City. That ordinance provides: "Any person or persons or corporation who shall, within the limits of said City, without first procuring a license therefor, exercise or carry on, either directly or indirectly, the trade, business, occupation or employment of auctioneers, peddlers, hawkers, canvassers of books, maps or other publications, canvassers, vendors or so-licitors of or for any medicine, invention or other articles of merchandise, to be sold, or taking orders therefor, on the streets or from house to house, or who shall set up, manage, give, hold or conduct a circus exhibition, menagerie, equestrian performance, musical or minstrel party or concert, theatrical or ballet troupes and combinations, exhibitions of wire dancing, puppets, wax figures, paintings, statuary, machinery, tricks of legerdemain, magic lantern exhibitions, skating rink or any other exhibition, show or amusement, for gain or profit, or where pay for admittance is required, shall, on conviction thereof, forfeit and pay for the use of said City not less than $10 nor more than $200 for each offense: provided, the fine shall not in any case be less than would have been required for a license; and provided, also, that no license shall be required for the sale of articles that are exempt from license by the Statutes of the State of Illinois, or for orders and sales at wholesale by drummers."

It was admitted on the trial that appellant, at the time of his arrest, was soliciting and taking orders for books, issued or published by his principal, on the streets, and from house to house, within the limits of said City, and without having procured a license therefor from the city authorities. The trial resulted in the imposition of a fine and costs. On appeal to the Circuit Court of Fulton County, the cause was re-tried, resulting in a judgment against appellant for $10 and costs. From this judgment appellant has prosecuted his appeal to this court.

It is here insisted that, as the defendant below was the agent of a publishing house located in the State of Missouri, and, in the acts complained of as being in violation of said ordinance, was engaged in the business of his non-resident principal, that the ordinance, when applied to him, interfered with the reserved powers given by the 8d clause of the 8th section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States to Congress, to regulate commerce "among the several States." Reliance is placed upon the case of Robbins v. Shelby County Tax Dist. 120 U. S. 489 [30 L. ed. 694], as sustaining that contention, and, if the ordinance is otherwise valid, it must be conceded that that question is involved. We do not deem it necessary, however, to discuss or determine this question, for the reason that the ordinance must be held invalid, as applied to the class of offenses with which the appellant was charged, upon other and to us more satisfactory grounds.

It is shown that appellant was canvassing from house to house, within the City, soliciting subscriptions to certain publications, taking orders therefor, to be paid upon the subsequent delivery thereof. It is not shown that he was carrying such publications, and proposing to sell and deliver the same, or any other goods, wares or merchandise, within said City. That he fell within the prohibition of the ordinance is not questioned.

The City of Lewistown is incorporated under the City and Village Act; and the authority to pass this ordinance must be found, if at all, in paragraph 41, § 1, art. 5, chap. 24, of the Revised Statutes, which gives the power to the city council, and the president and board of trustees in villages, "to license, tax, regulate, suppress and prohibit hawkers, peddlers, pawnbrokers, keepers of ordinaries, theatricals and other exhibitions, shows and amusements, and to revoke such license at pleasure." By a subsequent paragraph of the same section the city council is given power to pass all ordinances, and to make all rules and regulations as are proper and necessary to carry into effect the powers granted, and to impose penalties. The power given is to license, tax, regulate, suppress and prohibit "hawkers" and "peddlers," etc.; and, if it shall be found that "canvassers of books or other publications, on the streets or from house to house," are not "hawkers" or "peddlers," within the meaning of these words as used in the statute, then it is clear that the city council was without authority to pass an ordinance prohibiting such canvassing within the City without first obtaining a license, or imposing a penalty therefor.

It is to be observed that neither the ordinance nor Statute attempts to define who shall be deemed "hawkers" or "peddlers," and we are therefore to determine from authority whether appellant falls within these designations. We said in Chicago v. Bartles, 100 Ill. 61, that the term "peddler," as used in this Statute, was to be taken in its general and unrestricted sense, and embraced all persons engaged in going through the city from house to house, and selling commodities,—in that case, selling milk.

Abbott's Law Dictionary defines a "hawker" to be "a person who practices carrying merchandise about from place to place for sale, as opposed to one who sells at an established shop. It is equivalent to 'peddler,' the term now more commonly employed.

The same author quotes from the case of Com. v. Ober, 13 Cush. 493, as follows: "It is not, perhaps, essential to the idea, but it is generally understood from the word, that a hawker is 'one who not only carries goods for sale, but seeks for purchasers, either by outcry, which some lexicographers concede as intimated by the derivation of the word, or by attracting notice and attention to them, as goods for sale, by a actual exhibition or exposure of them, by placards or labels, or by a conventional signal, like the sound of a horn for the sale of fish.'"

Tomlin says: "Hawkers, peddlers and petty chapmen" are "persons traveling from town to town with goods and merchandise."

Bouvier defines "peddlers": "Peddlers. Persons who travel about the country with merchandise for the purpose of selling."

Webster's definition is: "A traveling trader; one who carries about small commodities on his back, or in a cart or wagon, and sells them."

This list of definitions might be extended almost indefinitely, but enough has been given to show both the legal and popular meaning of the words "hawker" and "peddler." It has never been understood, either by the profession or the people, that one who is ordinarily styled a "drummer," that is, one who sells to retail dealers or others by sample, is either a hawker or a peddler; and the same is true in respect of persons who canvass, taking orders for the future delivery of books and periodicals or other publications. It is a fundamental canon of construction that the Legislature must be presumed to have used these words in their known and accepted signification, and intended thereby to confer upon the city and village authorities power to license, regulate and prohibit only such callings and vocations as might fall within the terms employed in the Act, as thus known and understood. To concede that the power of the City to license, tax or regulate the canvassing for books or publications within the City is doubtful, is to deny the power. "Any fair, reasonable doubt concerning the existence of power is resolved against the corporation, and the power is denied." 1 Dillon, Mun. Corp. §§ 55, 251.

While it must be conceded that the evil resulting from the method of canvassing from house to house may be great,—indeed, as great as that resulting from the vocation authorized by the Statute to be taxed and regulated, and indeed may be even greater,—yet, if the Legislature, as we are constrained to hold, has not conferred upon cities and villages the power to tax or regulate the same, if relief is to be obtained, resort must be had to the legislative department of the State.

We are of opinion that so much of the ordinance as prohibits canvassing for books and publications in said City without obtaining a license therefor is void, for want of power in the city authorities to ordain the same, and appellant, not falling within the designation of a "hawker" or "peddler," was not amenable to prosecution under the valid portions of said ordinance.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is therefore reversed.

Schofield and Bailey, JJ., concurring specially:

We concur in reversing the judgment below upon the ground that the ordinance is in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, as held in Robbins v. Shelby County Tax Dist., 120 U. S. 489 [30 L. ed. 694].

The depreciation in the value of land lying along a highway, due to the construction of a railway on the opposite side of, and next to, it gives the owner a right to compensation, under a constitutional provision that private property shall not be taken "or damaged" without just compensation.

(Bulley, J., dissent.)

(March 31, 1890.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, Third District, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Mc-Lean County in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover damages for trespass upon, and depreciation in the value of his property in and by the construction of a railway. Affirmed.

Statement Per Curiam:

This case comes to this court on appeal from the appellate court, the judges of that court having certified that it involves questions of law of such importance, on account of principal and collateral interests, that it should be passed upon by this court. The facts and questions of law involved in the case are sufficiently stated in the opinion filed by the appellate court, which is as follows:

"CONGER, J.:

"Appellee owns a farm of about 316 acres, bounded on the west by a public highway sixty-six feet wide, running from the City of Bloomington in a northerly direction, known

NOTE.—Condemnation of land for railroad purposes; measure of damages.

The measure of damages against a railroad company for land taken under the right of eminent domain is the difference between the market value of the whole property before and after the building of the road. Schoykill River R. R. Co. v. Stocker, 128 Pa. 283; Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. McDougall, 8 West. Rep. 321, 118 Ill. 239; Dupuis v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 1 West. Rep. 454, 115 Ill. 97; Shurt v. Rochester & F. R. Co. (Pa.) 8 Cent. Rep. 637; Pittsburgh, B. & R. Co. v. McCloskey, 1 Cent. Rep. 819, 110 Pa. 428; Scislar v. Pennsylvania R. V. R. Co. 2 Cent. Rep. 337, 113 Pa. 84; Shepherd v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 120 U. S. 436 (32 L. ed. 970); Re Union Elevated R. Co. 30 N. Y. S. R. 164.

Whether the assessment be for damages to the tenant in fee, for life or for years, the rule as to the measure of damages is the difference between the value of the property (that is to say, the tenant's interest therein) unaffected by the injury, and its value as affected by the injury. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Geta, 3 Cent. Rep. 591, 113 Pa. 214.

If the location of a railroad so affects property that it will compel the removal of business conducted by tenants to another place, the difference between the value of the machinery in connection with the business conducted on the property, and its value to be removed and applied to the same or other use, is a proper element of damages. The reasonable expenses of removing the machinery are also proper items of damages. Ibid.

It is proper to take into consideration all elements of damage caused by such construction, which tend to diminish the value of the property. Chicago, E. & N. R. Co. v. Hazels (Neb.) April 17, 1890.

Just compensation includes not only the value of the land taken, but also the diminution in the value of that from which it is severed. Lafin v. Chicago, W. & N. R. Co. 23 Fed. Rep. 418; Hyde Park v. Washington Ice Co. 4 West. Rep. 233, 117 Ill. 233.

If the market value of property is depreciated by the proximity of buildings, fences, etc., to the track, or if danger from fire lessens the value of the premises for sale or use, that element may be considered in fixing compensation. Central & O. R. Co. v. Brake, 126 Ill. 388.

In estimating the value of land taken in condemnation, the jury are not to determine how it could best be divided into building lots, or conjecture how fast they could be sold, and they are not to inquire what a speculator might be able to realize out of a re-sale in the future, but what a present purchaser would be willing to pay for it in the condition it is in at that time. Pennsylvania R. V. R. Co. v. Cleary, 125 Pa. 442.

Evidence of value of land taken. See notes to San Diego L. & T. Co. v. Neale (Cal.) 3 L. R. A. 32; Theobald v. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. (Miss.) 4 L. R. A. 735.

The temporary injury sustained on account of obstructions placed in a street during the building of a railroad constitutes a claim for damages apart from the claim, under the Ohio statute, for permanent depreciation of the property. Shepherd v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 120 U. S. 436 (32 L. ed. 970).

Where property has been depreciated in value by reason of the street's being occupied by a railroad company, such depreciation is ascertained by the difference in its value before and its value after the final location and construction of the road, Ibid.

The owner of property near to the street is entitled to the remedy given by the statute, if the injury to it is the direct and necessary result of the occupancy of the street by the railroad company, or can be fairly attributed to such occupancy. Ibid.

Any depreciation in the value of residence property occasioned by the probability that a railroad company, in operating and using its road, will make unusual and loud noises, and emit from its engines smoke and cinders, and cause other like annoyances naturally incident to the operation of cars, is a proper element to be considered in estimating damages to such property by the location and operation of the road. Fort Worth & N. O. R. Co. v. Pearce (Tex.) Dec. 2, 1889.

Any obstruction of communication with the streets, which interferes with his enjoyment to such an extent as to materially depreciate the value of the premises, is liable to the lot owner in the amount of such depreciation. McQuaid v. Portland & V. R. Co. (Or.) Dec. 10, 1889.

Although the railroad is constructed under authority of a municipal ordinance, it is nevertheless liable to an abutting property owner for the actual diminution in the market value of his land, caused by the construction of its track. Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Bourne, 11 Colo. 32.
